It seems to me that at this time we should not forget that the people of the communities for which we are now legislating are accustomed to a condition of things very different from that which we wish to inaugurate. Upon their statute-books at this time and for many years past have been laws against education, making the instruction of a large class of their population a penal offense. This view of the case alone, it seems to me, should justify some provision of this nature.

The mover of this amendment has very fully and eloquently proclaimed to us the difficulties that result in a republican Government from the want of education. We should all be able to judge of the advantages of education in free Governments. It is, as I believe, and I think I may assert without the fear of contradiction anywhere, the chief corner-stone of free Governments; and in my judgment one of the most creditable acts of the last Congress was the establishment of a Department of Education, and I hope the time will soon arrive when each branch of the national Legislature will have a standing committee on the subject to take into consideration this great interest of the Republic. The national Legislature has heretofore made liberal grants of the public lands to the States for purposes of education. We know that in many of those communities which were lately in rebellion the school fund thus granted has been diverted and put to other uses than that which was intended by the Congress of the United States. There should be some correction of this evil, some guarantee that there shall not be hereafter a violation of the trust created by these donations of the General Government for educational purposes.

I am warmly in favor of the amendment now presented, and I hope it will be sanctioned by the Senate.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I rise to express the opinion that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] is not open to criticism for the sentiments which he has expressed upon this occasion, nor for the position which he has assumed. The former are justified by facts, which are open and known to all; and the latter is a necessity imposed upon him as the representative of a special class of people in the country. He says that these States to be called into being under the provisions of this and a prior bill will be States born of the bayonet; in other words, of military power. This figure of speech represents nothing but the actual, honest, notorious, indisputable truth. The section of country about which our legislation is now concerned is by act of Congress divided into five military departments, and over each of these is, or is to be, placed an officer not less in rank than a brigadier general of the Army of the United States, with power to take jurisdiction not only of civil affairs, but to exercise criminal jurisdiction, to institute military tribunals, both courts-martial and military commissions, for the trial and punishment of offenders, and with no limitation upon the power of the military dictator set over the district, except that when he proposes to take life there may be an appeal to the President of the United States. That is the condition of things established by the act to which this bill is a supplement.

Now, sir, what does this bill do? It provides in a section of country thus subjected to military rule the most unlimited, for the organization of civil governments, State governments; and how? The military commander of the district is to appoint whomsoever he pleases to act under whatsoever rules he may prescribe, according to his own pleasure, his own unregulated will, as agents and officers to execute the plan of reorganization proposed. And these, his appointees, owing no obedience to any known law, and without rule or regulation for their conduct other than that which he shall prescribe, are to proceed to enumerate the inhabitants, or rather to register the electors among them, preliminary to, what? Why, sir, to their exercise of the most valuable and fundamental privilege of freemen—the institution of government for themselves. And for any abuse of power, for any fraud, for any corruption, for any outrage, for any misconduct whatever, this bill and its predecessor are utterly destitute of any provision for punishment.

And then what next? After the returns are made to this military commander he has control of the assembling of the convention by which a constitution is to be formed. All subsequent proceedings up to the time when the plan is consummated, so far as it can be consummated in the State concerned, is to be under his absolute control. And we are told in this debate that it will be improper for us to insert any regulation whatever to prevent fraud or to cause this proceeding to be regular, efficient, and fair to the citizen. We will not even authorize these officers, who are to be appointed by him, to administer legal oaths for the ascertainment of the most necessary fact in compiling the registration upon which suffrage is to be based. It is said the military commanders can make all necessary regulations. That was the answer given me when I proposed an amendment, as it was the answer given when other amendments introducing regulations into the administration of this system were offered. Described, then, in general terms and according to the plain and unquestionable fact, this section of country is under absolute military rule; and this whole proceeding for the reorganization of civil governments according to the wishes and according to the pleasure of Congress is to be absolutely and entirely under the control of the military power. There is not one jot of judicial power or authority to be exercised through any court or magistrate in or about the whole proceeding from beginning to end. Well, then, and truly did the Senator from Massachusetts describe these prospective States as States to be born into existence and to take their places among our States by virtue of the bayonet; or, to abandon the figure of speech and to use plainer language, by military power. That he should be called to account for this language; that the accuracy, the propriety, fitness, and timeliness of this description should be impeached, is most surprising.

I rose, sir, in behalf of common reason and fairness to protest in his behalf—although I am a volunteer upon the occasion—against the justice of the criticisms which have been leveled against him, or rather against his remarks.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to say to the gentleman that his apology in behalf of the Senator from Massachusetts is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then, sir, I will proceed to the other point; and I propose to make that equally plain, and I hope equally satisfactory. It has been objected to the Senator from Massachusetts that he comes forward here near the close of the debate, at a late hour in the evening, with a new proposition; with a condition, or a guarantee, or a provision, (however you may describe it,) which looks to something further, which looks to something beyond what has heretofore been proposed. Now, sir, I justify the Senator from Massachusetts for this as well as for his description of these new States or of the manner in which they are to come into existence. The Senator from Massachusetts is the pioneer of agitation upon this floor, and he has filled that position for years. I have not been an inattentive observer of the general course of debate and of the general succession of events in this Chamber and in this Government during the last five or six years. And, sir, the propositions which the Senator from Massachusetts makes one year and which are criticised by his colleagues as extreme, inappropriate, and untimely, are precisely the propositions which those colleagues support with greater zeal and vehemence, if possible, than he, the year following. In short, sir, we can foresee at one session of Congress the character of the propositions and of the arguments with which we are to be favored at the next in this Chamber, by looking to the pioneer man, who goes forward in advance, his banner thrown out, his cause announced; the means by which it shall be carried on and the objects in view proclaimed with force and frankness.

Now, sir, the Senator from Massachusetts sees as clearly as I see, and as other reflecting men see, that this measure of reconstruction, as it is facetiously termed, adopted at the late session, to which the present bill is a supplement, is not the conclusion [Mr. SUMNER. Of course not.] of our agitations in this country upon this subject of reconstruction and upon the relations of the two races in the southern country; and with that caution which a sagacious man is bound to exercise, or at least may well exercise, he gives us notice in advance that this gulf is not closed up, that there are debates and difficulties and questions in the future, and that warm passions will be abroad. When the reconstruction bill, so-called, was passed near the close of the late session, I endeavored then, stating my views upon that subject, to give reasons for believing that it was not a measure of adjustment. I do not believe that Congress alone will ever settle this question, this sectional difficulty about which we have had war, and about which we are now passing laws—I mean the relations of race—and it never will be settled until it is settled by the sovereign people themselves at their popular elections, when they shall choose to somewhat reorganize and “reconstruct” our political parties; when it shall be decreed by them that there shall be a settlement; when they shall begin to choose agents to represent them pledged to end our sectional disputes with all the troubles which attend them.

I say, then, that in my opinion the Senator from Massachusetts stands justified by the necessities of his position as the pioneer man of his political organization in saving the point of honor for himself for the future, in preparing himself to point back in future times to this very debate and to other debates of the present session, in which he has indicated clearly that your contrivances for patching up a hollow treaty of peace between the North and South did not deceive or bind him, and that he should be at perfect liberty to resume or continue that career of agitation which no doubt his friends think useful, but which those who differ from him in opinion must be permitted to think pernicious.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Cole, Corbett, Drake, Edmunds, Fowler, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Gimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Sprague—13.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in, namely, strike out all of the House bill after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof insert:

That before the 1st day of September, 1867, the commanding general in each district defined by an act entitled “An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,” approved March 2, 1867, shall cause a registration to be made of the male citizens of the United States, twenty-one years of age and upward, resident in each county or parish in the State or States included in his district, which registration shall include only those persons who are qualified to vote for delegates by the act aforesaid, and who shall have taken and subscribed the following oath or affirmation: “I, ———, do solemnly swear, (or affirm,) in the presence of Almighty God, that I am a citizen of the State of ———; that I have resided in said State for ——— months next preceding this day, and now reside in the county of ———, or the parish of ———, in said State, (as the case may be;) that I am twenty-one years old; that I have not been disfranchised for participation in any rebellion or civil war against the United States, nor for felony committed against the laws of any State or of the United States; that I have never taken an oath as a member of Congress of the United States, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, and afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof; that I will faithfully support the Constitution and obey the laws of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, encourage others so to do, so help me God;” which oath or affirmation may be administered by any registering officer.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That after the completion of the registration hereby provided for in any State, in such time and places therein as the commanding general shall appoint and direct, of which at least thirty days’ public notice shall be given, an election shall be held of delegates to a convention for the purpose of establishing a constitution and civil government for such State loyal to the Union, said convention in each State, except Virginia, to consist of the same number of members as the most numerous branch of the State Legislature of such State in the year 1860, to be apportioned among the several districts, counties, or parishes of such State by the commanding general, giving to each representation in the ratio of voters registered as aforesaid as nearly as may be. The convention in Virginia shall consist of the same number of members as represented the territory now constituting Virginia in the most numerous branch of the Legislature of said State in the year 1860, to be apportioned as aforesaid.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That at said election the registered voters of each State shall vote for or against a convention to form a constitution therefor under this act. Those voting in favor of such a convention shall have written or printed on the ballots by which they vote for delegates, as aforesaid, the words “For a convention,” and those voting against such a convention shall have written or printed on such ballots the words, “Against a convention.” The persons appointed to superintend said election, and to make return of the votes given thereat, as herein provided, shall count and make return of the votes given for and against a convention; and the commanding general to whom the same shall have been returned shall ascertain and declare the total vote in each State for and against a convention. If a majority of the votes given on that question shall be for a convention, then such convention shall be held as hereinafter provided; but if a majority of said votes shall be against a convention, then no such convention shall be held under this act: Provided, That such convention shall not be held unless a majority of all such registered voters shall have voted on the question of holding such convention.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the commanding general of each district shall appoint such loyal officers or persons as may be necessary, not exceeding three in each election district in any State, to make and complete the registration, superintend the election, and make return to him of the votes, lists of voters, and of the persons elected as delegates by a plurality of the votes cast at said election; and upon receiving said returns he shall open the same, ascertain the persons elected as delegates according to the returns of the officers who conducted said election, and make proclamation thereof; and if a majority of the votes given on that question shall be for a convention, the commanding general, within sixty days from the date of election, shall notify the delegates to assemble in convention, at a time and place to be mentioned in the notification; and said convention, when organized, shall proceed to frame a constitution and civil government according to the provisions of this act, and the act to which it is supplementary; and when the same shall have been so framed, said constitution shall be submitted by the convention for ratification to the persons registered under the provisions of this act at an election to be conducted by the officers or persons appointed by the commanding general, as hereinbefore provided, and to be held after the expiration of thirty days from the date of notice thereof, to be given by said convention; and the returns thereof shall be made to the commanding general of the district.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the electors qualified as herein specified, cast at said election, (at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification,) the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session, then immediately upon its next assembling; and if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as therein provided.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all elections in the States mentioned in the said act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, shall, during the operation of said act, be by ballot; and all officers making the said registration of voters and conducting said elections shall, before entering upon the discharge of their duties, take and subscribe an oath faithfully to perform the duties of their said office, and the oath prescribed by the act approved July 2, 1862, entitled “An act to prescribe an oath of office.”

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all expenses incurred by the several commanding generals, or by virtue of any orders issued, or appointments made, by them, under or by virtue of this act, shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the convention for each State shall prescribe the fees, salary, and compensation to be paid to all delegates and other officers and agents herein authorized or necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act not herein otherwise provided for, and shall provide for the levy and collection of such taxes on the property in such State as may be necessary to pay the same.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the word “article,” in the sixth section of the act to which this is supplementary, shall be construed to mean “section.”

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no further amendment be proposed, the question is, Shall the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time?

Mr. THAYER. I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] was rejected. I voted with the majority on that vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That has been voted on three times already.

Mr. DRAKE. I rise to a question of order. That amendment was voted upon—

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all.

Mr. DRAKE. The gentleman will allow me to state my point. That amendment was offered by the gentleman from New York to my proposition while it was pending, after the vote on my proposition had been reconsidered. The vote on the amendment of the gentleman from New York was adverse to it, and then the vote on my amendment was taken again, and that amendment was carried. Now, sir, I submit to the Chair the point of order that there can be no motion now to reconsider the vote on the amendment of the gentleman from New York until the vote on my amendment shall be reconsidered.

Mr. CONKLING. Why not? This can be reconsidered.

Mr. DRAKE. But the first thing the gentleman has to get at is the order in which the propositions can be reconsidered. The last vote was on my amendment, and that vote must be reconsidered before the gentleman can reconsider the vote on his amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is still another point. The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as amended, has been agreed to; and that is the end of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was a reconsideration of this same amendment, and there can be but one reconsideration of the same vote. The Chair is of opinion that this motion is not in order.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to suggest that no reconsideration has been had of the amendment that I offered. A reconsideration was had of the other amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. This is the amendment which he declined to offer, and there has been no reconsideration of this. I submit to the Chair that there is no point of order to be made upon reconsidering a vote when it has not been before reconsidered. Certainly it is in order to reconsider this amendment now if it over would have been; and it must be in order once to reconsider a vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Chair is perfectly right. The proposition of the Senator from Missouri was voted upon and reconsidered; the other was a mere amendment or appendage to that, and as a matter of course the disposition of the main proposition disposed of the amendments pending to it. The proposition of the Senator from Missouri having been once reconsidered, and that being the principal proposition upon which the other amendment was founded, it cannot be again reconsidered.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say that although being against the proposition of the Senator from New York, I voted for the reconsideration to give him an opportunity to try his proposition again in the Senate. It having been once voted down in committee, and then a second time deliberately voted upon in the Senate, and in a fuller Senate than we have now, whether the motion be strictly in order or not, I do not think it exactly the fair thing to make the motion again at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say on the point of order, in reply to my friend from Ohio, that although we have once reconsidered a vote adopting a proposition, when we have again on that reconsideration adopted the proposition it is just as much open to a motion to reconsider the last vote as it ever was; and we have frequently reconsidered the same proposition two or three times. The only way to cut off further reconsideration is to move a reconsideration and have that motion disagreed to. I do not know whether this vote ought to be reconsidered. I merely make the suggestion lest we are led to establish a bad precedent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I really hope the Senator from Nebraska will withdraw this motion to reconsider and let us dispose of this bill. We have had two distinct votes upon this same proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has ruled the motion out of order, and no appeal has been taken. The question is, Shall the amendment be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 38, nays 2; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Sherman, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew and Hendricks—2.
ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Kiddle, Saulsbury, and Sprague—13.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think the bill had better be printed as passed by the Senate, so that it may go to the House as a printed bill. I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at eleven o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 18, 1867.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM MARYLAND.

Mr. JOHNSON. I beg leave to present the credentials of Hon. Philip Francis Thomas, elected one of the Senators of Maryland for the term of six years commencing on the 4th of the present month. I move that he be permitted to take the oath of office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be read.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to the reading of those credentials, but I desire to make a motion that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be read.

The Secretary read the credentials.

Mr. HOWARD. I now renew my motion to refer those credentials to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I should like to know the reason which influences the honorable member to depart in this case from what has from the first been the almost universal usage of the Senate, to receive the Senator-elect upon his credentials; and if there be in point of fact reasons why he should not continue a Senator they have been made the subject of subsequent examination.

Before, however, the honorable Senator assigns his reason, I hope to be excused for availing myself of this occasion to say that in point of loyalty to the Government now the honorable member who has been chosen by the Legislature of Maryland to represent her in this body is just as sound as I am or as any member of this body. What may have been his opinions of the causes which led to the late war, or what may have been his opinion of the manner in which the war was conducted, I am perfectly satisfied that if he is admitted to his seat in this body he will be found faithfully performing the trust reposed in him and observing in all particulars the oath which he will be required to take. He has done nothing which will render it improper by him to take that oath; and I know him so well from a long and an intimate acquaintance as to be justified in saying, and it is due to him to say, that if he had at any time done any act falling within the prohibition of that oath he would be the last man in the land to take it. The fact, therefore, that he is willing, as I understand, to take that oath is conclusive evidence with me, and will be with all who know him, that he has done nothing inconsistent with the duty which he owes to the Government of the United States. I hope, therefore, my honorable friend from Michigan will not make this case an exception from the general rule of suffering the member to take his seat on the faith of his credentials, and if there be any grounds upon which the Senate may suppose or the honorable member may suppose that he should not continue in this body they will be made matter of subsequent examination.

The Senate is now about, as I trust, to close its session; and it may be important, and in the judgment of Maryland, no doubt, it is supposed to be important, and in that opinion I concur, that Maryland should have two representatives on this floor. The whole effect of refusing to receive the member upon his credentials is to leave her, as she now is, with only one representative here. I make an appeal, therefore, to my friend from Michigan to suffer the honorable member to be inducted into office by taking the same oath that he has taken and which each of us has taken.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Maryland very properly asks me for my reasons for making the motion to refer the credentials. Of course I am bound to respond so far as I am able in my present condition of voice. Personally I have little knowledge of the political history—

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot hear the honorable member.

Mr. HOWARD. The honorable member from Maryland will pardon me for speaking so low; in the condition of my throat I dare not raise my voice higher. It is matter of common rumor that the gentleman who is now the applicant sympathized warmly with the rebels during the late civil war. One rumor which has reached my ear is that he performed an act tending to give aid and comfort to the rebels during the existence of the rebellion. Of course I shall not vouch for the truth of these rumors. Judging from some remarks which were reported in the newspapers as having fallen from the lips of the applicant directly after his election in Maryland, I infer, if there be any truth in the newspaper account of his speech, that at present he does not feel a very warm attachment to the body as a member of which he now offers himself. At all events, whatever may be the truth of these rumors, I submit to the honorable Senator from Maryland that it is entirely fitting and proper that this matter should be investigated by the committee both in reference to the Senate of which he proposes to become a member and especially in reference to himself. Surely I think if I labored under such rumors I should be entirely willing, nay, anxious, that the proper committee of the body should inquire into their truth before I offered to take the oath and to participate in the legislation of the body.

What I say, Mr. President, I do not say out of any spirit of unkindness or prejudice in regard to Mr. Thomas, but merely that an investigation may be had by the Committee on the Judiciary and a report made.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I do not certainly know to what rumor the honorable member refers in relation to any particular act of the Senator-elect of aiding the rebels. I can imagine that he refers to what was stated on the floor on Saturday evening, that he had while Secretary of the Treasury transferred a large amount of money from New York to Louisiana, in anticipation of what he supposed would then take place, the rebellion, that it might be there to be seized by the rebellion if it should occur. I have mentioned that to my colleague, and he authorizes me to say that there is not one word of truth in it. The transfer of funds that he made while Secretary of the Treasury in 1860 was of some seven or eight hundred thousand dollars from New York to Washington, to meet the necessary disbursements of the Government, and the whole of it was disbursed here. The only other sum that was transferred by his order was a sum of some eighty or one hundred thousand dollars from Arkansas, where it was, to New Orleans, where it was needed, and where it was all expended before the rebellion commenced. I have already said, Mr. President, in what I have stated, that from my knowledge of the character of the honorable gentleman, his word upon that subject will carry with all who know him claims to absolute confidence.

It is possible—that I know nothing—that he may have supposed the war might have been avoided. He was not alone in that opinion. It was entertained by thousands and is now entertained by hundreds of thousands in the loyal States or in the States called loyal; and I have no doubt that many of them are to be found in the State which the honorable member so ably represents; but I submit that that is no reason for disfranchising them from office. All that I know of the conduct of the gentleman, and I suppose I had better opportunities of knowing, or as good opportunities at least of knowing, as those who have started the rumor, is that he took no part against the Government during the war. He remained at his own home in the pursuit of his profession and never raised his arm, or as far as I am advised, raised his voice against the Government of his country. It is possible (and in that others in Maryland share with him) that he may have believed, and doubtless did, that the government of Maryland as it was recently administered was not republican in form; that it existed upon the suffrages of not more than about one fourth of its population. He may have spoken in decided terms of what he considered to be the injustice and the unconstitutional principle involved in that condition of things. In that the honorable member will pardon me for saying I fully concur, not because I was disloyal—

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland will allow me to say one word. I did not allude to the principles of the gentleman in reference to the State of Maryland or his connection with Maryland politics at all in what I said. He is reported in a newspaper report to have said directly after his election that the present Senate of the United States had done all in their power to dissolve the Union by war and fighting, in which they had failed, and that now were seeking to attain the same end by legislation. I do not give the language of the speech, but simply refer to it; and I think that is the substance of the speech as reported. I think that a very unkind remark of the applicant if he made the remark. I do not vouch for the truth of his having made such a remark. If a man can be called a strictly loyal man, attached to the Government of the United States, who holds that the entire action of Congress in the prosecution of the late civil war and the suppression of the rebellion by an appeal to arms was after all an effort on the part of Congress to destroy and dissolve the Union, then I have lost my knowledge of the meaning of language. A man who thinks that all our legislation for the prosecution of the late war was in hostility to the Government and to the Union cannot be held to be a strictly loyal man. Now, sir, it seems to me that the honor and the reputation of the applicant himself are concerned in the investigation of that one particular fact if there be no more. Did he say so, or did he not say so?

Mr. JOHNSON. I know nothing of the speech to which my friend refers; I have not seen it; but what I do know is that in the letter accepting his nomination there will be found nothing at all inconsistent with what will be his duty to the Senate if he becomes a member, or his duty to the country; and I therefore send that letter to the desk, and ask that it be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

ANNAPOLIS, March 16, 1867.

GENTLEMEN: I have had the honor to receive your joint letter of the 12th instant, informing me of my election by the General Assembly as a Senator of the United States for the term of six years from the 4th of March instant.

I receive this evidence of the confidence of the representatives of the people of Maryland with profound gratitude; and in accepting the distinguished honor conferred upon me, I beg to offer the assurance that in the new sphere of service to which I am about to be removed I shall spare no effort to serve my native State with fidelity and zeal, and with a determined purpose to maintain unimpaired all her rights as a coequal sovereign member of the Federal Union.

The country, as all are aware, is at this moment surrounded by embarrassments from which there are few persons who can discover an avenue of escape. The union of the States as it came from the hands of its authors is, this day, disrupted by the absence of ten of its members from the Federal councils, and the lovers of free government are looking with intense anxiety for a change in the condition of our internal relations. There are many who despair of early relief; but judging from the known patriotism of the great masses of the people of the North and West, as well as the deep-seated love of a common country which animates the hearts of the representative men of those great sections, in and out of Congress, I cannot allow myself to believe that the work of restoration will be delayed to any very remote or indefinite period of time.

Reason will, I trust, soon resume her empire over the minds of men of all sections, and the passions engendered by the late civil strife will so far subside as to give full play to that "sober second thought" under the influence of which our beloved country has been more than once rescued from impending perils.

Influenced by such hopes and desires, I shall repair to the seat of Government with undoubting confidence that at no distant day the Union of our fathers will be restored in all its integrity, and that our country will resume the career of greatness and power which, under the guidance of wisdom and patriotism, surely is its manifest destiny.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

PHILIP F. THOMAS.

Lieutenant Governor COX, President of the Senate, and OLIVER MILLER, Esq., Speaker of the House of Delegates.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, Mr. President, I submit to the honorable member and the Senate that the gentleman who could write a letter of that kind is not one from whom the country is to apprehend any danger; on the contrary, that it proves him to be in all respects our equal in loyalty to the Union. I hope, therefore, that my friend will not continue to think it his duty—a feeling that I am sure animated him in making the proposition—to persevere in his resolution to have these credentials referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. If we are to be responsible for newspaper reports of what we may say, often written by those who are inimical to us personally, and more often politically, there is not one of us who would bear the test of examination; or rather, to speak more correctly, there is not one of us who ought not to be sent to some committee for the purpose of having our loyalty investigated. If the honorable member is permitted to take his seat, I know him well enough to be assured—and I cannot too often repeat it—that he will be faithful to the duty which will then be upon him, and that if upon examination, if any should be made thereafter into his conduct during the war, any fact should be established showing that he would be an unworthy member of this body, there is no one upon the floor who would more certainly and more promptly vote him out of the Chamber. But I share in no such apprehension. Knowing the man now for some twenty odd years, I know that his word will be as sacred as the word of any member of this body; that his oath will be as sacredly kept as the oath will be kept of any member of this body. And I ask, therefore, in the name of justice and in behalf of my State, that in this preliminary mode (not departing from the almost universal usage) he shall be permitted to take the oath, and that the investigation, if any shall be deemed necessary, may hereafter be made.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, there is a question in this case which I think it is eminently proper that the Judiciary Committee should inquire into. It is claimed by men in the State of Maryland whose loyalty has never been questioned, men who have been active in defense of the Union while others have been passive at least, that the election at which the present Legislature of Maryland was elected, which has performed the high duty of sending a Senator here, was a palpable fraud upon the existing laws of Maryland. The Union people, at least some of them who have conferred with me upon the subject, assert that fact. They say that they had a law standing upon their statute-book which prevented all persons who had aided or sympathized with the rebellion from voting at their elections; but at the last election that law by some operation was disregarded, and persons of all kinds, those who had been engaged in rebellion and sympathizers with it, were permitted to vote, and by their votes the Legislature was elected that has sent here this gentleman as Senator. If that be true, it seems to me eminently proper that the Judiciary Committee should inquire whether any act that Legislature performed, so far as it affects this body, can be regarded as binding.

I am informed of another thing which the honorable Senator from Maryland will be prepared to answer in a moment if the applicant is here, that when he resigned from Mr. Buchanan's Cabinet a short time before the rebellion broke out in its fury he said in letters that he was forced to leave from the fact that he could not concur in the propriety of any attempt to reinforce Fort Sumter, or words to that effect, in which he denied entirely the power of coercion. If that be true, it shows certainly what he was then. If that be not true, the Judiciary Committee in one hour can say so.

Again, it is charged by some—whether it is true I know not—it has been already denied by the honorable Senator from Maryland—that a large amount of money was transferred by the then acting Secretary of the Treasury from some point to New Orleans that was there seized for the confederate government; that the time the money was sent it was a well-known fact that there was no one in power in the city of New Orleans but those who sympathized with the effort to secede, and that that money was there seized.

I say again that as to the truth of these things I know not, but they are matters of public report. If they are true, if he has done these things, it seems to me they disqualify him from taking a seat in this body. If they are not true, it is certainly due to the gentleman himself that a report of the proper committee, which can soon be made, should disabuse the public mind in regard to them. I do not know anything of those things myself; but I do know that many of the most prominent citizens of Maryland who have all the time enjoyed the confidence of the loyal people of that State are not willing that this applicant should be admitted to a seat without investigation.

Now, sir, I have discharged my duty. I know the Senator from Maryland says we can investigate these things afterward and act then, but I hardly think if the applicant be once admitted that would be done in this hour of forgiveness, this hour of good feeling. It seems to me that we should know the truth of these things before he is admitted. If he is a proper man certainly he should be admitted; if improper, he should be rejected. The committee will very soon be enabled to judge from the facts whether he has sympathized with rebellion to such an extent as to disqualify him for a seat in this body.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, if I understood the honorable Senator from Maryland in his opening remarks in regard to this matter, he was guarded in the expression which he made concerning the applicant now for admission into this body. I understood the honorable Senator from Maryland to say that there was no question as to the loyalty now of the gentleman whose credentials have been presented here this morning. I should like to know from the honorable Senator from Maryland whether I understood him correctly?

Mr. JOHNSON. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not hear his question.

Mr. DRAKE. I stated that I understood the honorable Senator from Maryland, in his opening remarks upon this subject, to say that there was no question about the loyalty to the Government now of the gentleman whose credentials have been presented.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did.

Mr. DRAKE. I would call the attention of the Senate to that guarded form of expression on the part of the honorable Senator from Maryland. The gentleman whose credentials have been presented may be loyal now and may have been very disloyal in time past. I think that the very expression used by the honorable Senator from Maryland is one which justifies the reference of these credentials to the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will reply to the question of the honorable member from Missouri in a moment. I do not know that the honorable member from Nevada heard me when I said that the charge made against the Senator-elect of transferring funds to New Orleans in anticipation of the rebellion is positively denied.

Mr. NYE. I stated in the remarks I made that that charge was denied.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, in relation to what may have been the conduct of the Maryland Legislature, my friend will pardon me for saying that over the Legislature of Maryland this body has no jurisdiction. It would be a dangerous, a most dangerous principle, to hold that it is in the power of Congress to supervise the deliberations of the State governments. To do so now may answer the purpose of a party, but it will be pregnant with mischief. The time may come when the propriety of the legislation of Nevada may be called in question; she may be charged with disloyalty as evinced by the deliberations of her legislative body, and in that way her Senators may be evicted from this floor, or at least new Senators who may be elected in their place not received. Within the limits of the Constitution the States are absolutely independent of the General Government; and it is the privilege of every man in every State to comment freely, boldly, upon the conduct of any party who may be in power; and as illustrating the necessity and the wisdom of permitting that license, permit me to say to the honorable member that he has indulged in it more than once in relation to a coordinate department of this Government. He has over and over again assailed the motives of the Executive. He did it in the exercise of his undoubted right; but in doing so he manifested no disloyalty within the meaning of that term as known to the Constitution; and the honorable member from Michigan, by whom this motion has been presented to the Senate, has done the same thing over and over again; and I claim the right, whenever I shall deem it my duty to do so, to comment freely and courteously upon the conduct of every department of the Government, legislative, judicial, or executive. We shall cease to be freemen when we hold ourselves bound to speak in bated breath of the conduct of any branch of the Government. It is only by discussion, free and unrestrained, that the liberties of the country can be sustained by restraining every department of the Government from trespassing beyond the limits of its constitutional power; and if, therefore, Maryland or the gentleman in whose behalf I am now speaking has at any time questioned the conduct of any department of this Government in proper terms, it was but the exercise of a right common to the citizens of Nevada, and a right which the honorable member himself in the instance to which I have adverted has more than once exercised.

Now, sir, in relation to the question of the honorable member from Missouri, permit me to say to him that to impeach the loyalty of any member of this body upon a rumor of former disloyalty may involve us all more or less in trouble. I have heard it said of members elsewhere, to say nothing of those here, that in the beginning of the rebellion they shared in the opinions of the South; they believed either that the South possessed the right to leave the Union because of the right to secede, or they believed that the treatment the South had received from the northern States was such as to justify leaving it as a revolutionary right. But I listen to no such reports. It is sufficient for me, if there be any member of this body who may have been included in any such reports, to know that he is willing to take that oath, and that after taking it he fulfills the duty which the oath imposes.

Permit me also to say, in answer to the special question of the honorable member from Missouri, that he has altogether misunderstood me. I stated that in relation to the present loyalty of my colleague I supposed no one would doubt; but did I mean to say by that that he had all through our troubles been disloyal? Did the honorable member not hear me when I said that he was willing to take that oath, and that I knew he would forfeit his life rather than take it unless he could take it with a clear conscience? And if he can take that oath with a clear conscience, he is as loyal as the honorable member from Missouri is or ever was, or as the honorable member from Nevada is or ever was. In relation to opinions preliminary to the outbreak of the war, and in relation to opinions expressed during its progress, there are to be found differences everywhere. Many sternly loyal, to be found in the Army as well as in civil life, were of opinion that the war might have been avoided, and were of opinion that, the war upon us, it might have been conducted in a way more likely to achieve its object—the restoration of the Union; and many are now of opinion that Congress, having in 1861 declared that the war was waged for the simple object of effecting a restoration of the States with all their rights unimpaired, it has in that respect not been true to its plighted faith; but does that prove disloyalty? As well might it be alleged that I and those who have concurred with me in differing from the honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] in relation to some of the propositions which from time to time he has laid upon the table were disloyal. I never charged or believed that the honorable member from Massachusetts, in offering his propositions from time to time, which, as I thought warred against the rights of the States that had been in rebellion, was disloyal; and I am sure he will do me the justice to say that he never supposed that in resisting them I showed any want of loyalty. Upon both sides there was an honest difference of opinion; and without knowing what my colleague may have said from time to time in relation to the causes which produced the war, or in relation to the mode in which the war was conducted, I can say this, as I think, with a perfect conviction of its truth, that he has never uttered a word which can be tortured into disloyalty in the sense which I understand that term bears constitutionally. I am not seeking in his behalf, and he would repudiate it if I attempt it, to avoid an investigation. I only assume, not in his behalf, but in behalf of my State, that he shall be permitted to qualify upon his credentials, and then he, I am sure, will desire that the fullest investigation shall be made.

The honorable member from Nevada has brought another charge upon rumor, which I never before heard; that in resigning his post as Secretary of the Treasury, he did it upon the ground, and so stated in his letter, that he did not concur with what was then understood to be the determination of President Buchanan to succor Fort Sumter. He tells me that that is wholly unfounded. There is no such a word to be found in his letter, and he resigned merely because, as he believed, the President was about to interfere with the customs in a way not authorized by the law of the land, to collect them outside, without statute, an opinion which was entertained by all the law officers of the Government at the time when the rebellion broke out; and we passed a law to enable it to be done. But neither in that letter, as I am advised, nor in anything that he has ever written can there be found any evidence at all that he is not as loyal as either of us.

Mr. NYE. The great point of difference between the party with which the distinguished Senator acts and myself on this subject has been that that party has contended that each House of Congress had a right to investigate for itself and determine for itself the propriety of admitting or rejecting any member that presented himself for admission to either body. The honorable Senator has spoken several times upon that subject, and if it was possible for me to be convinced, I should certainly have been convinced under his reasoning. Now, the time arrives for the application of the theory for which he and those who act with him have constantly contended when we come to investigate the propriety of the admission of a member from Maryland, and very much to my surprise the honorable Senator opposes it. He says admit him first and investigate afterward. To that theory I desire simply to enter my dissent.

The honorable Senator from Maryland cannot expect me to stand here as an accuser and vouch for the truth of what I have brought forward. I have never in my life seen this gentleman, and I never heard of him except as Secretary of the Treasury; but I repeat that upon the theory on which this Senate is divided, the honorable Senator from Maryland is estopped from taking the position which he now assumes. How often have we heard it offered, not only from him but others, that each House should judge for itself of the elections, qualification, and returns of its members. When judge? When the application is submitted.

I simply desire to say, that good loyal men of Maryland say to me that they desire the privilege of appearing before this committee to show that this man was not only disloyal before the rebellion broke out, but that he has sympathized warmly with it throughout. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I do know that these men who have stood like a breakwater between the lashing waves of rebellion and saved to us temporarily the State of Maryland are at least entitled at the hands of this body to a fair investigation into the supposed charges that may be made. That is all I ask, all I require. I think that is right.

When the honorable Senator from Maryland says that Nevada's Legislature may be inquired into, the remark has no terror for me. I am ready for it. I claim that it is entirely proper for this body to inquire what are the proceedings of a Legislature that has sent a member to this body. We inquired last year into the proceedings of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, and the result of that inquiry was that the sitting member in that case was decided not to be entitled to his seat. The only difference between that case and this is that he was permitted to take the oath and take his seat, and then the Senate on investigation held that he was not entitled to retain it. In that case as in this, however, the action of the Legislature was investigated. Does the honorable member from Maryland mean to say that if the conduct of that Legislature was fraudulent and this election was the result of that fraud, it would not be proper for this body to inquire into it and so declare? If he yields that point, I insist upon it the next follows, and if that Legislature was fraudulently elected, and the fruit of that fraud was the sending of a man illegally to this body, we have a right to inquire into it.

The honorable Senator from Maryland will not deny the fact that upon the statute-book of Maryland, until it was recently repealed by this Legislature, if indeed it has been repealed, there was a law that forbade the voting at their elections of rebels and rebel sympathizers. That law, I repeat, if common rumor, if the reports of the papers, if the assertions of representative men from Maryland, whose word the honorable Senator would not disparage here or elsewhere, are to be believed, has been utterly disregarded; and men who have worn the rebel uniform, and stepped to the music of anything but Yankee Doodle or Hail Columbia, controlled the late election in Maryland, and the fruit of it is that they have sent here, as the loyal men claim, a man who deeply sympathized with the rebellion.

Now, it seems to me that it is entirely proper, ay, more, it amounts to a solemn duty on the part of this body to inquire whether or not this is true. I hope this reference will be made in justice to Maryland, in justice to the applicant, and in justice to this body itself.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I was not fortunate enough to hear all the remarks which were made by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] who, I believe, raised this objection. There may be something more specific in his objection that led him to make the motion to have these credentials referred than I am aware of. I am certainly opposed to allowing any person to take or occupy a seat in this body who is an enemy of his country, or who participated in the late rebellion by giving it aid and comfort or in any other way. But, sir, while that is so, I do not think it is the business of this body to inquire into the political opinions of gentlemen who are elected by the several States as members of the Senate. The States exercise their own judgment in making selections for representatives here; and while I deny that they have a right to send here an enemy of the country, or one who has participated in rebellion against the country, and think we have the right to object upon the threshold and to exclude from this body any such person, I do not know what there is in this case that should justify the motion which I believe the Senator from Michigan made as to these credentials. What is it? Is there any specific charge? I do not understand that there is.

It is said that this gentleman's politics are not right. There are a great many men whose political opinions are not right. I think my friend from Nevada said that this body had a right under the Constitution, in judging of the election, qualifications, and returns of its members, to decide upon the propriety of admitting a member. Sir, it may have the power; but it has no right to decide on the propriety of admitting a member. There is no such right vested in the Senate, and it would be an abuse of its power in its discretion to admit members to this body. We are bound by the Constitution which we have sworn to support to admit members who come here possessing the qualifications required by that instrument. Though we might have the power to violate our oath and our duty to the Constitution, we should have no right to do it. We do not judge of the propriety of sending a particular person here.

But, sir, if this question is referred to the committee, what is there for the committee to investigate? I should like to know from my honorable friend from Michigan or Nevada.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Legislature of Maryland!

Mr. TRUMBULL. Investigate the Legislature of Maryland! That would be taking a step that has never been taken in this body. Maryland is recognized as one of the States of this Union, having an equal right with the State of Nevada to send Senators here; and what would my good friend from Nevada have said if, when his credentials were presented the other day and read, which we were all so much pleased to hear, some person had risen and said that he had seen it intimated in a Nevada paper that the Legislature of Nevada was not properly elected, that there was some man holding a seat in it who ought not to have been declared elected because he got some illegal votes, and that we should have left our friend from Nevada upon the threshold of the Senate until we inquired whether anybody in the mining districts of Nevada hunting after gold had voted when he ought not to have voted. I should not have been willing to do without the services of my friend here while that investigation was going on. I should have thought we had better admit him notwithstanding any such suggestion of anybody.

Now, sir, it will not do to assume the position that every person who disagrees with us politically is an enemy of his country. It is one thing to disagree about the mode and manner of maintaining the Union, one thing to differ about the proper mode of prosecuting the war, one thing to differ as to the best mode of putting down the rebellion, and another thing to join the enemies of the country to destroy the Union. There was a great difference of opinion all over this country on these points. I am not for entering into any investigation to inquire whether this man was right in his opinions or not. If there is any specific charge presented by the Senator from Michigan or the Senator from Nevada upon his responsibility here as a Senator that the gentleman whose credentials are presented has been engaged with the enemies of the country to overthrow the Government, if either Senator will make that statement, I will join with him to go into this investigation, and if the facts sustain the charge I shall be in favor not only of referring the credentials, but of denying him a seat, and if he were in his seat I would vote to turn him out on such a state of facts being established.

But I do not understand that any such allegation is made. I do not know what the committee is to do when the credentials are referred. I understand that this gentleman proposes—and if he does not do it he cannot take his seat—to go to your table, sir, and, appealing to the supreme Ruler of all for the truth of what he says, declare that he has taken no part in this rebellion, and has given it no aid or comfort. Prima facie, at least, if he does that he is entitled to his seat. Now, is there anything before us to overcome the prima facie case? Is there anything presented to us to show that this is untrue? If so, what is it? It seems to me that our plain duty upon the presentation of these credentials is to allow the gentleman to be sworn as a member of the body, unless there is something to overcome the prima facie case which is in his favor. He is certainly entitled to be sworn in unless there is something to satisfy us beyond mere newspaper rumor, beyond mere suggestion, something that is tangible and strikes us as a matter of truth, of public notoriety, or some record evidence that might be presented here at the threshold which should overcome this prima facie case and make it proper to investigate the matter in the first instance.

As a general rule, Mr. President, all persons having regular credentials are admitted, not only in this, but in all legislative bodies, I think, in the first instance to be sworn in as members. It is only in a very few instances that that rule has been departed from in this body; and in those instances it has only been departed from upon evidence submitted at the time the objection was made showing that there was reasonable ground to suppose that the party was not entitled to his seat. It has never been done, I think, under any other circumstances.

Mr. GRIMES. And the objection has been supported by remonstrances.

Mr. TRUMBULL. And even where remonstrances have been presented the party has been admitted to be sworn in the first instance. I recollect when I first came to the Senate, a dozen years ago, there was a remonstrance of a portion of the members of the Legislature by which I was elected denying my right to a seat. It was presented here at the same time that I appeared to be sworn in as a Senator; but I was permitted to be sworn and took my seat, and an investigation was afterward had, and the Senate decided that I was properly entitled to the seat. My friend from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] was sworn in as a member of the Senate at the same time. There was also objection to his right to a seat, and that was investigated, and at the next session the Senate decided that he was not entitled to his seat. He was permitted to hold his seat during a whole session, and at the next session the Senate decided that he was not entitled, under his election, to retain his seat, and therefore he went a second time before the Legislature, and was a second time elected. That has been the usual course even in the face of a protest in writing denying the right of the person to be sworn as a member. I see nothing in this case, so far as I have heard—as I said I was not fortunate enough to be in when the Senator from Michigan first commenced his remarks—to justify us in departing from the usual mode of proceeding, and I trust the gentleman will be permitted to be sworn upon his credentials.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, prior to the unfortunate and unhappy war in which we have recently been engaged there was, I believe, no instance on record, at least I never heard of any, in which, where a gentleman claiming to have been elected a member of the Senate presented his credential in due form, he was not considered entitled to take the oath and take his seat in the Senate, subject of course to any objections that might afterward be made. There have been but two instances since that I recollect in which this usage has been departed from. One was the case of a gentleman who was appointed Senator from Oregon, [Mr. STARK,] and who came here to take his seat. Before his credentials were presented I received a large package of papers tending to show that he was disloyal, that he had expressed disloyal sentiments, sentiments adverse to the Union and in favor of the rebellion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That was during the war.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir; that was during the war. I speak of that as the first instance. I presented those papers at the time the credentials were submitted, and I think I made the motion myself that the credentials, with those papers, should be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that we should have a report prior to his being permitted to take his seat. That was resisted on the ground of the uniform usage which had prevailed before, gentlemen claiming that the proper course to take would be to allow him take the oath, and then have the matter investigated afterward. I contended, however, that in that state of things, in my judgment, the Senate had the power, and it was their duty to assume the responsibility when charges of disloyalty were made, of refusing to allow the member to be sworn; because, although it would be in the power of the majority then to keep him out if he was disloyal, it might require, and would require, if he was once admitted, two thirds to remove him. The majority of the Senate, I think quite a large majority, acceded to the correctness of these views, and the papers were all referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who made a report. I think the report was in his favor; at any rate, he was afterward sworn in and served out his term of office.

The only other instance that I have been aware of is the case of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. PATTERSON.] It was alleged against him that he had taken an oath of office under the southern confederacy, and on that statement, which was not denied, his case was also referred to the committee, and he was not allowed to take his seat until it had been investigated.

Mr. JOHNSON. The fact was admitted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, the fact was admitted.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. The Senator from Maine will allow me to remind him that I demanded an investigation in that case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am aware that the Senator was perfectly willing to meet an investigation; but I am speaking of the precedent merely. The fact itself was admitted, and on the admission of that fact it was contended that the papers should all be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and an investigation had previously to his taking his seat, and that course was taken.

In both those instances there were specific charges: in one supported by numerous affidavits making the specific allegation of disloyalty; in the other, the admitted fact, admitted by the Senator claiming the seat himself. In similar cases even now I would be in favor of referring the credentials to a committee previous to the Senator being allowed to take his seat in the Senate. But, sir, it is a precedent that is not to be followed except in a case calling for it on specific grounds. Wherein do those cases differ from the present? Here, the gentleman claiming to be a Senator from Maryland, presents credentials in due form. A Senator rises and states that he has heard it rumored that he was disloyal, and he has seen it stated in a newspaper that he had made a speech in which he spoke disrespectfully of this Senate. I think, if my memory serves me, that all that he is said to have stated in that newspaper has been said, and more than that, repeatedly on this floor by my friend from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] with regard to the action of the Senate being revolutionary, &c., and he holds his seat to this day, although we have the perfect power, so far as number of votes is concerned, to expel him at any time, if we should see fit; and he was resworn a very short time ago without objection, although I could point to the record where he has expressed opinions very much more sharp than those that were read from the newspaper.

We will lay, then, the character of our precedent and the newspaper out of the question, and look at what is said by my friend from Nevada and my friend from Michigan. It is rumored that this gentleman was disloyal, that he expressed disloyal sentiments, found fault with the Government in divers ways. Why, sir, I say with all respect to the Democratic party, if you act on that ground you could hardly have a Senator of that party on this floor. I am certain that with regard to the leaders of the Democratic party in my section of the country you could not find one that could come here and take a seat if he is to be kept out on these grounds; or it would be very difficult at any rate. It has been a very common expression among gentlemen of that political faith. I agree, therefore, with my honorable friend from Illinois that with regard to these opinions expressed it would be going very far, indeed, to undertake to say that if they were proved beyond any question we could safely take the ground that men who had expressed such opinions were not entitled to seats in this body. But, at any rate, supposing it to be true, no Senator here and no person brings any specific charge, exhibits any proof. There is no remonstrance, no fact stated with reference to the whole thing upon anything except mere rumor out of doors, going to affect the position of this gentleman in relation to that matter.

Now, sir, can it be said, when no members of the Legislature of Maryland have remonstrated, no persons from Maryland have sent a remonstrance here, no proof is exhibited, no statement in writing is made, nothing for which anybody is responsible, that we can with any propriety refuse to allow this gentleman to take his seat in this body upon his taking the usual oath? It strikes me that it would be not only an unwise, but a most extraordinary proceeding; and although exceedingly sorry that Maryland has been so unwise as to elect a gentleman of that political faith to a seat in the Senate, I do not feel that I should be justified in any way whatever in interposing any obstacle to his taking his seat on this floor.

There is another objection made, and that objection arises from the constitution of the Legislature of Maryland. My friend from Nevada will allow me to say that that is not like the case of New Jersey. In the case of New Jersey, the claim of Mr. Stockton, we did not undertake to investigate the question whether any of the members of that Legislature were properly elected. The question there was, whether those who were elected had proceeded legally in the choice of a Senator. That we always have a right to do. That is unquestionably our right and our duty. What they have done in the process of an election, whether they have gone according to the forms and substance of law, and made a legal election, it is undoubtedly our right to investigate and our duty to investigate. That is a common inquiry; but it is a totally different question, and I never heard it raised or pretended that this body had the right to go into the question of the election of the members of the Legislature and inquire whether or not they were legally and properly chosen. Every legislative body in this country by its constitution has the right to settle the question of the election of its own members. We claim it; we have it by the Constitution of the United States; the House of Representatives has it; every legislative body in the country has it. Over that there is no control; they are the exclusive judges of questions of that description. If there are irregularities, violations of law, or anything of that sort, in the formation of the body, I do not see how we can remedy that matter or how we can go beyond the mere question of whether the election was legal in point of form, so far as the members themselves constituting the Legislature chose to make it. I do not know but that there might be extreme cases presenting themselves in which the Senate would go into that question. I cannot say that there might not be a case so strong and so extreme of violence at the ballot-box, of an overruling of the will of the people making a Legislature, and the getting of power by usurpation, that I would not inquire into it; but in a case of this description, presenting itself as it does, it seems to me that there is no severe occasion calling for our interposition in a question of that description.

Sir, it is not the thing, in my judgment, for us to interpose an objection to a gentleman taking his seat on this floor simply because rumor, not common, but rumor has it that there is something wrong either in relation to the man or to his election. If there has been anything wrong in the formation of the Legislature of Maryland, why do not the minority of the Legislature of Maryland put themselves on record and send their remonstrance against the election on that ground? Has a single man who voted in the election of Mr. Thomas, a member of the Legislature of Maryland, presented his remonstrance or his objection to the man, and put his name to it, or to the election and put his name to that, or to the form of the election as it was, or to the election of the Legislature, thus making it illegal, and put his name to that? Not one, as I understand it. Now, sir, although I should be very much better pleased to have seen another man here than Mr. Thomas—I know nothing about him individually except by slight reputation—yet in a matter affecting the constitution of this body and our modes of proceeding, I am unwilling to give my vote in favor of a precedent which I think would be very dangerous, and which is certainly at war with the whole history of the body since it was constituted originally. Therefore, unless something more is shown than has been shown by the honorable Senator who made the motion, or by my friend from Nevada, I shall feel compelled to vote to allow Mr. Thomas to take the oath and admit him to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no question of constitutional law raised in this matter, and it is with us simply a question of the order of business. The right of the Senate to pass upon the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members is given by the Constitution. Ordinarily, when a paper is presented in due form, showing the election of any citizen of the United States with the requisite qualifications by any State, he is admitted to his seat. We have the right, however, to pass upon the election, returns, and qualifications of the member. Whether we do it before he is sworn into office or afterward is simply a matter of discretion in the body. Our right as judges, given to us by the Constitution, would undoubtedly authorize us to pass upon his qualifications before administering the oath of office. There can be no doubt about that. It is therefore simply a question of the order in which the business of admitting the new member shall be transacted. In ordinary cases the oath is administered because it is presumed no objection will be made, or if objection be made afterward, that objection is inquired into and the action of the Senate can then be reconsidered.

It seems to me that in the present condition of the country there is enough on the public records and in the history of the country which we have before us to induce us to refer the credentials of the gentleman, who now claims to be a Senator from the State of Maryland, to the Committee on the Judiciary. That is the view I take of it. The last action we have from this gentleman before the war is at least indicative of a very singular state of mind, or a very singular opinion. I admit that mere political opinions ought not to exclude any one from a seat on this floor. Unless those opinions go to make him what we call disloyal to the Government they ought not to exclude him from taking the oath of office. But I call attention to the letter of this gentleman when he resigned his position as Secretary of the Treasury under Mr. Buchanan. After acts of war had been committed against the Government, after the Star of the West had been fired into, after the war had commenced practically, and he was then a member of the council of the President of the United States, in resigning he wrote a letter addressed to the President, an extract from which I will read:

"MY DEAR SIR: It has not been in my power, as you are aware, to agree with you and with a majority of your constitutional advisers in the measures which have been adopted in reference to the present condition of things in South Carolina; nor do I think it at all probable that I shall be able to concur in the views which you entertain, so far as I understand them, touching the authority, under existing laws, to enforce the collection of the customs at the port of Charleston."

This gentleman retired from the position of Secretary of the Treasury, where he had charge of the finances of the country, because, he said, the United States had no power to collect the duties at the port of Charleston. Why had we no power to collect them? Simply because at that time Charleston, being in the State of South Carolina, was not in the Union; South Carolina had seceded, and therefore we had no authority to enforce the revenue laws in the city of Charleston; therefore secession was a constitutional right; the Union was dissolved. On this basis, which denies the authority of the United States in the city of Charleston, after the ordinance of secession, he retired from the Cabinet of the President of the United States, occupying a position which of all others required him to enforce the revenue laws of the United States.

Now, to say the least of it, this position of the gentleman who presents himself as a member of this Senate from the State of Maryland places him in a very embarrassing situation; one that would require at least explanation before he takes his seat here in a body composed of Senators of the United States, and after a war in which we have enforced the authority of the United States, not only in Charleston, but over the whole southern States. He started out before the war, proclaiming the idea that secession was a constitutional remedy, and that by secession South Carolina had withdrawn from the Union, and that there was no authority to enforce the laws of the United States in the State of South Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSON. Where did he say that?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what it means practically. I hardly think the Senator would quibble on the words "under existing laws," because the existing laws were just as much in force then in Charleston, South Carolina, undoubtedly as they were in the city of New York, unless the ordinance of secession which had then just been passed had carried the State out of the Union.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator will allow me to inquire if there was not then existing the law passed in 1832 for the collection of the revenue in insurrectionary States?

Mr. SHERMAN. The force law was only temporary in its character.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable member will permit me, as I do not want to reply to him—

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust Senators will allow me to finish what I have to say.

Now, Mr. President, we have no official record from that time to this, or until the election of this gentleman as Senator from Maryland; we do not know, I have no information myself, and the Senate has none, at least none has been disclosed to us of the course of this gentleman during the war. We certainly did not hear of him aiding the Government or aiding the United States or contributing to put down the rebellion. If he has done so, it has certainly escaped my observation or recollection. Perhaps even that should not be sufficient as the evidence of disloyalty. But my impression was very injuriously affected against the gentleman now claiming a seat from the speech referred to by the Senator from Michigan, and also by the Senator from Maine. If that speech was only like the speeches of my friend from Kentucky, denouncing the conduct and the course and policy of the Senate of the United States, it would be but a mere difference of opinion. We have no authentic record of that speech, we have nothing but what we find in the newspapers; but let me read what is said by this gentleman in this speech as reported in the Baltimore American, a newspaper published in the principal city of his own State, and that must have had an opportunity to report him correctly. If it is incorrectly reported, it is because the information we have is not correct. Let me read this speech, made on the 11th of March, 1867:

"Mr. Thomas was subsequently introduced and thanked the caucus."

That was after he was nominated.

"During his speech he said that if permitted to take his seat in the Senate"—

He seemed to doubt that—

"he pledged himself to assert the rights of the State. The men now assembled at Washington before the war occurred were bent upon destroying the Union. They went to war, believing it tantamount to dismemberment, and were now bent on the establishment of a military despotism."

All that might have passed as a part of the language of partisan warfare; but he said:

"He would go there to face these men, who are now and always were traitors to the Union."

Mr. SUMNER. "Always were?"

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir, "and always were traitors to the Union." If this is a correct report of this speech it is certainly singular that this gentleman should come here under the peculiar circumstances by which we are surrounded and seek to take a seat among us, who are and always have been traitors to the Union, as he says. Why, sir, here are the men who fought to maintain the Union, who caused four hundred thousand lives, perhaps, to be sacrificed during the war in that effort, who involved our country in debt to the amount of $3,000,000,000, who have gone through this terrible war; but he says that during all this time and before we were traitors to the Union, that we entered into this war for the purpose of dismembering the Union! We have no evidence of his course of conduct during the war from the time he resigned his place in Mr. Buchanan's Administration until he comes forward and makes this speech; and under such circumstances it seems to me he does present himself in such an attitude that we have a right to inquire into his loyalty to the Union. If we are traitors and he loyal, then we ought to vacate these places and give way to a Senate of the United States composed of men like himself. If this language was not used, if this information is incorrect—we take it only as a part of the history of the country—the Judiciary Committee, which will examine this matter, can very properly inquire into it.

I would not exclude this gentleman for political opinions. I will not exclude him for any mere informality. He has been duly and legally elected by the Legislature of Maryland, and the only ground upon which we can exclude him is by such evidence as would convince us that he is disloyal to the Government of the United States. If we have that evidence, either in the form of newspapers or in such a way as to exhibit a reasonable ground to believe that he is disloyal to the Government of the United States, we are bound to make an inquiry before we arm him with the authority of a Senator of the United States and administer the oath of office. Certainly, with no feeling against this gentleman, no personal unkindness to him, it does seem to me that this is a case which falls within the exception stated by the Senator from Maine himself, where it is proper to refer it to the Judiciary Committee. If they find that this speech is an error of the newspaper, and was not the utterance of the newly-elected Senator, as a matter of course they can inform us of that fact.

In the admission of new Senators from this time forward we shall be compelled to be careful and guarded. I will not myself vote unreasonably to exclude any man who comes here with the credentials of any of the existing or loyal States of the Union or any of the reconstructed States when they come back with Senators. I am not disposed to be harsh and hard with them. I want them simply to show a loyalty and fidelity to the United States that would authorize them to sit here in the councils of the Government and join with us in making laws upon which will depend the safety, honor, and dignity of the United States. But it does seem to me that if this speech was uttered by the newly-elected Senator he is not in a position to come here and take his seat by our side, and we should shrink from our gravest and most serious duty if we allowed men with these opinions, showing their disloyalty, to participate in making laws for the people of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. If Mr. Thomas made that speech it is enough to put this Senate upon inquiry. If with his opinions he regards the members of this Senate as disloyal and traitorous from the beginning, and himself a patriot, the converse of the proposition must be true, that if we are loyal he must be a traitor. I think an utterance of that kind is enough to put this Senate upon inquiry, and that it is due to the character of the Senate that these credentials should go to the Committee on the Judiciary. I will remark further that after having heard that speech read I should like to know something about the history of this man during the war. He has probably been doing something upon the one side or the other, and I think we should be informed as to what course he has taken in reference to the rebellion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I thought the time was passed, after the din of arms had been hushed, after the people of this whole country, North and South, were looking for a renewal of kindly feelings, when we should hear honorable gentlemen who have occupied the highest positions in their States and in the country charged with being disloyal. Suppose that Mr. Thomas, the Senator-elect from Maryland, had in a political speech used such language as that; is there a Republican Senator upon this floor who, during the last six years, has not charged his political opponents with being disloyal, with being copperheads, with being traitors? Why, sir, you have not got a press in the country scarcely that has not charged upon the whole of the opponents of your party disloyalty and want of fidelity to the country just as broadly as the charge purports to have been made in that speech.

But, Mr. President, I read a report of the remarks of the Senator-elect from Maryland on that occasion, but in a different paper. I read the report of his remarks in the Baltimore Gazette. There was nothing of the kind reported. You bring here now a paper which has for years charged every opponent of its own principles with disloyalty. It manufactures a report of a speech made by the Senator-elect from Maryland, and that is brought as evidence that he did make it. Sir, have you not heard the President of the United States upon this floor charged with being unfaithful to his country, and in substance and effect with being a traitor? Is there a day that passes over your head that some member of the dominant party in the heat of debate does not charge his political opponents with having been unfaithful to the country, and even with being so now?

Sir, I profess to know something of the Senator-elect from Maryland, because I do not reside a very great distance from him. I know at least from reputation, and from having visited the town near which he resides, that he was leading a quiet, peaceful life during this war. Sir, when military despotism was being exercised in the States of Maryland, when a judge of that State was dragged from his bench and beaten over the head with pistols until he was insensible, because he dared to charge the grand jury of one of the counties of his district that men had not the right without warrant and due process of law to arrest their neighbors, no one undertook to make a charge affecting the character of Governor Thomas. One of the early recollections of my boyhood's days was Governor Thomas, then a young member of the bar, afterward honored by his constituents with a seat in Congress and elected Governor of the State. Having maintained a high character for ability and for patriotism all his life, now that he is elevated to the position of Senator of the United States we are to be told, on a report found in a political paper that never knew how to speak a kind word or a just word of its political opponents, that he is unfaithful to his country. Sir, if he had been unfaithful to his country, is it possible that the military vigilance of this country could not have discovered some act in all his life for six long years to give you an opportunity to exclude him from this body?

Now, sir, the letter that he wrote upon resigning his seat in the Cabinet of Mr. Buchanan is produced. He differed from the Administration simply in reference to the collection of customs under the existing law. I ask you, sir, whether you did not supply that defect afterward by passing an act through this body and the other House to give to the President of the United States the power to collect the revenue off Charleston harbor? It was upon that point, and that point alone, as appears from the letter, that he differed from the President of the United States. Was it not reasonable, sir? You had no law authorizing the collection of revenue there off the harbor. You had no custom-house officer. You refused yourselves to confirm a custom-house officer in Charleston, if my recollection is right, and subsequently brought in a bill and passed it through both Houses of Congress giving the Executive the power to collect revenue off that harbor; but that was after the resignation of Governor Thomas.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think my friend from Ohio has, undesignedly I am sure, done great injustice to the gentleman whose seat is in question in the construction which he puts upon his letter of January, 1861. In that letter he states that he will be unable to agree with the measure which, as he understood, the President, with the consent of the rest of his Cabinet, was about to adopt, because in his view there was no law which authorized the adoption of any such measure. All the officers of the Government of the United States located in Charleston had resigned. It was impossible, therefore, to collect the duties upon imports, if there should be any, in the ordinary way in which they were collected; and the measure proposed was to have them collected outside by sending a vessel off-war and appointing a collector to be on board of her, and to make her for the time being the custom-house at that port. He said, and as I think properly as far as the law of the land was concerned, that the President had no authority under the then existing legislation to adopt any such measure.

During the period of nullification Congress passed what was called the force bill, and it was a part of that bill that the President was authorized to collect duties outside of the port of Charleston. The ordinance which the people of the State of South Carolina had passed provided, and made it a penalty for doing so, that no duty should be collected at all upon any importations that might come into that port, and they prohibited any court, Federal or State, and any officer belonging to any such court, Federal or State, from sanctioning any measure by which the question of the legality of that ordinance of nullification or the right of the United States to collect, notwithstanding the ordinance of nullification, the duties there, should be tried. The Congress of that day, consisting of as able men and as patriotic men as have ever been found in Congress since, was of opinion that there could be no collection outside of the port under the laws existing at the period without additional legislation, and that additional legislation was had by the force bill. That legislation was of course temporary in its nature.

The law on the subject, therefore, had expired in January, 1861, when the letter which the honorable member has read was written, and Congress afterward, acting precisely upon the hypothesis on which Governor Thomas acted, that it required legislation to authorize a collection of duties outside of the port where they were only authorized to be collected by the existing law, passed the act of July 13, 1861, by the second section of which they gave that authority; but that law was not in force when he wrote his letter in January preceding; and as he thought he was bound by his oath of office to execute no law except under the authority which the law gave, and that he could not therefore be authorized to make collections in the way proposed by that Administration, he resigned. Now, what fault was there in that? If I had been in his situation I would have concurred with the majority of that Cabinet, because, in the then condition of things, I would not have inquired whether there was a law or not; I would have enforced the collection of the duties. But in the exercise of an honest opinion, justified by the mere legal question, he left that Administration. I might ask my honorable friend if he thinks it was a great act of treason to leave that Administration?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can only say that there were others who went out at the same time, and perhaps he went out on the same ground as Floyd and Thompson and Cobb and others, while Stanton, Dix, and a different class of men went in.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why does the honorable member think himself justified in saying that he went out perhaps on the same ground as those men, when he has read his letter of 1861, which shows the specific ground and no other ground? If I recollect aright, the ground assigned by one of the members of that Cabinet—Thompson, of Mississippi—was that the President, contrary to what he understood him to have pledged to the authorities of South Carolina, was about to reinforce Fort Sumter; but there is nothing of that in this letter.

Now, in relation to that speech, did he make it? What paper has the honorable member read from? A violent partisan paper. I wish to say nothing disrespectful of the press in any way, but I suppose it is no treason to the press to state that what they assert in relation to public men who differ from them in opinion is to be taken with many grains of allowance. I know in relation to myself personally that I have been often misrepresented by that press. I have never noticed it. I was satisfied to stand upon my own character, and to vindicate myself at the proper time and in my own way, without entering into any newspaper controversy; and that is the conduct which I shall pursue in the future. Now, I am told that that speech is reported in two or three other papers in a very different way.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator will allow me, I looked into the paper, the Chronicle, which has been read, and it purports to quote from a telegraphic dispatch from Annapolis to the Baltimore American.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I supposed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That dispatch as it appeared in the Baltimore American is copied in the paper here.

Mr. JOHNSON. Who sent the dispatch? Nobody knows. Is he entitled to credit? Nobody knows. Is he not a traitor himself? Nobody knows. We are here asked to exclude this gentleman from the usual privilege accorded almost universally to every member who appears with the credentials of his State upon the authority of one we know nothing about, to be found in a newspaper which is known to be thoroughly partisan in its character.

If the honorable member used these expressions certainly he would not have my approval; and I am equally satisfied if he used them at all it was under circumstances which he must in the end regret. I am authorized by him to say that he has not the slightest recollection of saying a word which would have justified such a statement as that. All that he did say, as the honorable member from Maine has said, was what has been said on this floor over and over again and in the other House. But suppose he did use that language. The President of the United States, in a speech, thought proper to call two members of Congress traitors. Did anybody propose to impeach him upon that ground? I never heard of it, whatever other grounds there might be. Any opinion which he entertains politically of the tendency of the actions or the purpose of any individual members of Congress is a matter with which Congress has nothing to do. Now, suppose I thought, as my friend from Kentucky has often thought, that what this Senate was about to do was inimical to the interest and safety of the country, and I had said that to do so would be treason to the country, would that justify the Senate in expelling me? I suppose no one will for a moment so state.

Upon one occasion, I remember, Mr. Webster in the Senate of the United States, in refusing his support to a proposed appropriation of $3,000,000 to General Jackson to enable him to meet an anticipated war, said that he would not vote for it if the enemy were battering down the Capitol.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. Thundering at the gates of the Capitol.

Mr. JOHNSON. Thundering at the gates of the Capitol, and that was said to be treason by Mr. Adams in the other House. He was told, or rather the House were told, by Mr. Adams that a man who would utter such a sentiment as that would in a moment take the other step, and would join the enemy; that there was but one more step to take, and that was to join the enemy. Did anybody propose to expel Mr. Webster from the Senate of the United States? And yet in one view, and in what would have been my view, he would have been false to his duty to the country. He ought not to have hesitated in the contingency which he stated from giving the appropriation to enable the Government of the United States to preserve the Capitol; but it was a political opinion which he had a right to indulge if he thought proper, if he really entertained it.

Mr. President, since the last session commenced the debates in the other House—I suppose I am at liberty to refer to them—and the debates here have been often exceedingly violent. The President here has been denounced, I was about to say in the most virulent terms; his motives and conduct assailed with a bitterness never before heard in this Chamber. Does anybody propose to expel the members who indulge in such remarks? Certainly not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator will remember that a member was called to order for using such language. The Senator and myself raised the point of order, and we were decided to be out of order in raising that point of order on the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] in a debate.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Constitution says that no man shall be called to account anywhere else for language uttered in debate here.

Mr. JOHNSON. Undoubtedly; but the Constitution does not say that a man who is a traitor in feeling or uses language that is traitorous in the extreme is not to be expelled from this body. For what he says in debate he is personally responsible nowhere else; but if he declares sentiments in this body which the body may think are unfit to be declared to the Senate, insulting to the Senate, and at war with his duty to the country, the Senate have a right to expel him; but they have never attempted to exercise any such right, as such cases have actually occurred.

Now, the honorable member from Ohio relies, first, upon a letter which proves directly the reverse, when the facts are understood, of the intent which he assigns to it; and he relies, in the second place, upon a telegraphic dispatch sent from Annapolis on the night of the day of election. We do not know even that the man heard the speech, and if we were certain that he heard the speech we do not know that he was capable of representing it fairly, and we do not know, if he heard it and was capable of representing it fairly, that he wanted to represent it fairly.

As I said before, to act upon any such proof as that is the establishment of a principle which is to govern the conduct of the Senate which will come home to plague the inventors. None of us are safe. An investigation in advance of the admission of a Senator upon his credentials is no more in the power of the Senate than an investigation after he has been admitted. If, therefore, any newspaper editor thought proper to say that the honorable member from Ohio had charged treason upon Congress, had been false to his duty, and was a traitor in principle, any Senator would have the same right to get up and ask that there should be a committee to inquire into the fact, saying that it was due to the dignity of the body.

The honorable member from Indiana says he wants it to be ascertained what was the conduct of this gentleman during the war. What for? Suppose he took no part. Was any man obliged to go into the Army of the United States upon the pain of disloyalty unless he was called there by the authority of the United States? Has not every man in a state of war the right to stay at home unless his country calls him? Is any man to be denounced as disloyal because he refuses to volunteer? How many of us would come within that definition of disloyalty? How many of us went into the Army voluntarily or otherwise? Not one in twenty; but we are not disloyal on that account, as I hope.

Now, we have no evidence at all, as my friend from Maine stated, coming from anybody except an unknown and unauthorized reporter, that this gentleman has said one word inconsistent with his duty to his country and the duty to the Senate, which is always coequal with the duty to his country. He offers himself ready to take that oath; and if the honorable member from Ohio, instead of relying upon an anonymous dispatch as showing the real sentiments of this gentleman, will refer to that which ought to be conclusive, in the absence of conclusive evidence to the contrary, the letter which he sent to the Legislature accepting his post, he will find no reason at all to doubt but that he is as loyal as the honorable member himself.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I am clearly of the opinion that this reference ought to be made. It is apparent from the discussion, so far as it has gone, that there are matters which ought to be inquired into. There has been a great deal said during the last few years with regard to the power of Congress over this very thing, to ascertain the loyalty of members who present themselves for admission. The question here raised is only a question as to the order of business, whether the committee are to investigate first where there is a charge of disloyalty, or whether it is to be investigated after the member has been sworn. If such a charge is made merely on newspaper rumor, I think it is due to the party, and due to the Senate, that it should be investigated. We shall have a large number of persons coming up here, if the South is restored, from the ten States now unrepresented, and it will be drawing an invidious distinction if we refuse now to refer this case to the Judiciary Committee, if we insist on such a reference of those cases. When this charge is made, I think the Judiciary Committee should be instructed to inquire into it if we intend to guard this body against, not only persons who were disloyal heretofore, but against those who entertain disloyal sentiments now. If we intend to guard it, as it is agreed on all hands we ought to guard it, it seems to me the natural order of proceeding whenever the question comes up is to refer it in the first place to the committee, in order that the party may be fully exonerated if he is not guilty of anything of the kind.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would ask the honorable member if there is not a difference between Maryland and the States that have been in rebellion?

Mr. STEWART. I do not suppose there is any difference between an individual in Maryland who aided the rebellion and an individual in South Carolina who did the same thing. I think the individual in Maryland, where he was free from coercion, who gave aid and comfort to the rebellion is much more guilty than one in South Carolina, where the entire people went into rebellion and there was no power of the Government to protect him who desired to remain loyal. I think the distinction is in favor of the party who lived in South Carolina, where no one loyal man had the moral or physical force to withstand the power of the community. I should not be as careful in criticising a person from South Carolina as I would a gentleman in a loyal State who freely and voluntarily, without any appearance of coercion, aided the rebellion. I would make allowance for a man in South Carolina that I would not for a man in Maryland.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member does not understand me. I mean to say that Maryland is to be considered as loyal a State as Nevada, and the presumption is, therefore, in relation to Maryland, when her Senator presents himself here, that he is just as loyal, and his State has as perfect a right to send him, as the honorable member or the State which he so well represents had to send him. The presumption in regard to States which have been in rebellion would be the other way.

Mr. STEWART. There is no doubt that the presumption in favor of every man is that he is innocent until he is proved to be guilty. The presumptions are that Mr. Thomas is innocent, but when there is a suggestion that there may be guilt it is then incumbent on the body to investigate it. The presumption is in his favor, and we should proceed to this investigation with all the presumption in favor of innocence. The fact that you investigate an alleged offense, when there is a suggestion of crime made, does not change the presumption. The presumption is that every gentleman who presents himself here is innocent of any offense that would disqualify him; and I shall go into the investigation fully impressed with all the presumptions in favor of innocence, but when the suggestion is made in the Senate that there may be guilt and an investigation is proposed, to refuse to investigate now will set an example that I say will embarrass us hereafter if we are to investigate such allegations in the future. The only question here is as to the order of business, for it is admitted that the investigation will be proper at some time. If we refuse to examine this case at this stage we shall be treating very cruelly some men against whom the suggestion is made hereafter. If we admit this gentleman before there is an investigation, a reference hereafter in the first instance will be regarded as a condemnation. Suppose we refuse this reference to-day and to-morrow a gentleman comes here from Kentucky who has been in the rebel army or against whom such a charge is made, a reference of that case in the first instance will be looked upon as sanctioning the charge. If the rule be that when a suggestion is made an investigation shall be had, then a reference gives no color to the charge; but if on this preliminary motion you make a distinction between one man and another, the reference of any case to the committee in the first instance gives color to the charge and condemns the gentleman whose case is so referred.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I listened with attention to the honorable Senator from Maryland when he was up in the construction that he gave to the passage read by the honorable Senator from Ohio from the letter of resignation of this gentleman, whose credentials are now under consideration; and I confess my surprise, when I come to read the paragraph, at the construction placed upon it by the honorable Senator from Maryland. It is not, as the Senator has stated, a resignation on the ground that Mr. Thomas did not believe there was legal power to enforce the collection of the revenue outside of the harbor of Charleston, South Carolina, at all, but upon other grounds. I will read from his letter addressed to the President:

"MY DEAR SIR: It has not been in my power, as you are aware, to agree with you and with a majority of your constitutional advisers in the measures which have been adopted in reference to the present condition of things in South Carolina."

Involving, as a matter of course, the entire political issues there. He says it has not been in his power to agree with a majority of the Cabinet in reference to these things, and he then continues:

"Nor do I think it at all probable that I shall be able to concur in the views which you entertain, so far as I understand them, touching the authority, under existing laws, to enforce the collection of the customs at the port of Charleston."

A proposition entirely in the future, and referred to as in the future, not then considered and decided; and he utters it as his opinion that he thinks he shall not be able, when that point is considered and determined upon, to agree with the President; but he utters his emphatic dissent from the conclusion arrived at by a majority of the Cabinet of the President upon "the condition of things in South Carolina," meaning the entire political issues there, if it means anything.

When this question was first presented to-day, and the motion to refer made, I listened with attention to what was said by the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee and by the distinguished Senator from Maine, and as the matter then stood I should have voted against the proposed reference; but the production of this letter, which had passed from my recollection at the time, puts the question, as I think, in a totally different aspect, and makes it my duty to vote not only for a reference, but to urge a close investigation. I will say further, that my vote will never be given to admit into the Senate any man who was either so weak or so vicious in 1861, in the month of January, as not to be able to find law enough to defend the honor and existence of this country, more especially any man who left the Cabinet of the President of the United States upon the ground that he could not discover power enough or justify his conscience in such a defense. I do not know any better time or occasion to make this point, and I know of no case in which it may be more clearly made than in the present instance. I do not, however, wish to prejudice this case. I would sooner have the entire letter than the extract of it given here, which of course the committee will have before them, so as to have the context, the entire surroundings, the history of the action of this gentleman when a member of President Buchanan's Cabinet. I think it is eminently proper that the credentials be not now received, or, if they be received, that they be referred and this matter investigated. I shall give my vote for that investigation.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have but a word to say. The honorable member from California is under a clear misapprehension as to the meaning of that letter. The circumstance to which reference is made by the writer is that all the officers of the customs had resigned, and there was, therefore, no means of collecting the duties there; and the only question which was before Governor Thomas at the time was, whether in the absence of the legal mode of collecting the duties by the custom-house officers, it was in the power of the President to have the duties collected outside the port in a vessel-of-war. To do that he supposed required legislation. To do that in the opinion of Congress in 1832 legislation was necessary. To do that in the opinion of Congress in 1861 legislation was necessary, for they passed the second section of the act of July 13 of that year for that purpose.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg the pardon of the honorable Senator, who is generally so correct in his analysis and statement. It is as clear from this letter as anything which was ever written that the declination spoken of and referred to was not put upon that ground; on the contrary, it is specifically stated by him that he thinks he shall not be able to agree with the President when that question is considered; but upon the other issues—what other issues?

"the present condition of things in South Carolina"—differs entirely with a majority of the Cabinet.

Mr. JOHNSON. In relation to the collection of the customs.

Mr. CONNESS. Not at all. I beg the honorable Senator's pardon.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I have been referred to by two or three of the gentlemen who have taken part in this debate, and therefore I intervene a word in it. In my condemnation of the measures of Congress I have never characterized or denounced the members of the Senate as traitors; I have never denounced any of their measures as treasonable, but I have denounced many of them as revolutionary.

Mr. President, I know but one test of fidelity to the Government, and that is the support of the Constitution. I know of but one measure of loyalty, and that is an honest adherence to and support of the Constitution. Whatever Senator or citizen sustains the Constitution as he understands it in good faith, in my judgment supports the Constitution. Whatever Senator deliberately, willfully, and knowingly votes for a measure which he believes is an infraction of the Constitution, acts for the time with the purpose to overthrow the Constitution, to subvert the Government, and to revolutionize it, and he is disloyal.

As has been stated in this debate, I have often said, in the course of my remarks in the Senate Chamber, that particular measures which I opposed were revolutionary. In my judgment they were revolutionary, and the deepest conviction of my mind and of my soul was and still is that they were revolutionary and utterly subversive of the Government.

Now I will say a word in relation to the question before the Senate. "Each House" is, by the Constitution, "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members;" and "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two thirds expel a member." The Senate in the trial of these different classes of questions is a different tribunal. In judging of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, it acts by a simple majority of the body; and the judgment of a simple majority of the body rules the point: but in relation to the expulsion of a member it is different. It requires the concurrence of two thirds to expel a member, and that is the security which the Constitution throws around the seats of the members of the Senate. The proposition is not now to expel a Senator from his seat; it is to pass upon one of the questions of the return, the election, or the qualifications of the gentleman who presents himself from Maryland, claiming a seat in the Senate. There is no objection to the return. That is admitted by all gentlemen to be in due form of law. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] referred to the election of this Senator as affected by the election and composition of the Legislature itself which sent him to the Senate. As the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] has properly said, that is a matter into which the Senate cannot make inquiry at all. The only other point is the qualifications of the Senator. The Constitution provides:

"That no person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not when elected be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen."

He must be thirty years of age, nine years a citizen of the United States, and an inhabitant of the State which elects him; these are the three single and simple qualifications of a Senator, and the Senate has no constitutional or legal power whatever to add to these qualifications.

What is the implication made in this debate against the gentleman who presents himself as Senator from Maryland? Forsooth he has charged in a speech that the Senate consists of a body of traitors. Suppose he had said so, what of it? Does his refraining from having made a declaration of that kind constitute a qualification for his admission into the Senate? It may be that the charge was made; it may be that it was falsely and maliciously made. If so, then it becomes a question for investigation upon a movement for his expulsion after his admission. It is not a matter to be inquired into in relation to age, residence, or qualification, which are the only three points in regard to which the Senate can make inquiry on the preliminary step of admitting a Senator to his seat. As the majority of the Senate may decide either one of these points, so is it to remain irreversibly adjudged; but when you come to the question whether this gentleman has maligned the Senate, whether he has falsely charged it with treason against the country, that is not matter of qualification, nor can it be tortured into a matter of qualification. It may amount to such conduct as would demand his expulsion from the Senate, or it may not amount to such conduct as that according to the judgment of different Senators.

Now, sir, what do gentlemen propose to do? Here is a matter which, if it can be made a charge and a cause of proceeding against this gentleman at all, must be made in the form of a motion for his expulsion, and it must be sustained by the votes, not of a majority, but of two thirds of the Senate to have any practical effect against him. I maintain that it is now premature to enter into that matter. If the return of this gentleman as a Senator from Maryland is in due form, if there is no question as to his possessing the constitutional qualifications, then according to all the precedents except two, as stated by the Senator from Maine, he is entitled to take his seat; and then if he has maligned the Senate, if he has slandered the Senate, if he has committed a scandalum magnatum for which he ought to be expelled from his seat, that is a point to be subsequently investigated, and which cannot be inquired into at this stage of the business. It must be deferred until he takes his seat, and then be properly considered. After he has taken his seat, that may be made the subject of inquiry by the Senate, and Senators may vote that it is or is not sufficient cause for his expulsion according to their judgment.

Mr. President, I have but one more word to say. I should feel myself humiliated if I could vote for the expulsion of a man from the Senate because he had charged me as a Senator with being a traitor. The charge of disloyalty has been made against me thousands of times, I suppose, but never has it reached me. I do not feel scorn for such a charge; I feel nothing but coldest contempt. I know that all such charges are utterly and flagitiously false. I know I have been as true to the Constitution of the country and to the Government of the country formed by that Constitution as any gentleman that lives; and what care I for the scoffs and flings and slanders and denunciations of a false, foul, and envenomed press in throwing out charges of disloyalty against me? I feel, I will not say an unutterable scorn, but I feel an indifference to all such charges that can never be reached or disturbed.

I know, Mr. President, that in the heat of debate I have sometimes indulged in sharp language, to use the phrase of the honorable Senator from Maine, and it may be vituperative language; but I have never attempted willfully to infringe the privileges of the Senate or of any of its members. I have never charged any of them with being traitors; I have never charged any of their measures with being treasonable; but I have charged, and if it was the last word I had to utter at the judgment seat of my Maker I would charge, that many of their measures have been and are revolutionary, subversive of the Constitution and of the form of government as I understand it, which we are all sworn to support. In making this charge it has never been my purpose to trespass the freedom of debate. I trust the time will never come when the freedom of debate will be hushed in the Senate Chamber. At any rate, so long as an individual humble as myself shall be allowed to hold a seat here, I will indulge in that freedom of debate guaranteed to me by the Constitution of my country, and the exercise of which is the highest duty that I can perform to my constituents and my country.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I do not concur at all with the doctrine of the Senator from Illinois that it is incompetent for the Senate to inquire into the propriety of suffering an applicant who comes here to take a seat in this body. On the other hand, whenever there is reasonable suspicion that such an applicant cannot truthfully take the oath prescribed in the act of 1862, I hold it to be the duty of the Senate to refer the matter for the purpose of inquiry and information. Otherwise we might, in some cases at least, be winking at perjury and setting aside the very act which we passed for the protection of this body against rebellion. It is a matter of mere inquiry and in the nature of an inquiry. We all know the books of parliamentary law lay it down as one of the rules that inquiry is always justified upon the grounds of public rumor. It is laid down in the books of parliamentary law that even the impeachment of an officer of the Government may be based upon public rumor. Such, doubtless, at one time was the parliamentary law of England; but I will not stop to go into these points.

It is said by the learned Senator from Maryland that the letter to which reference has been made, written by this applicant, dated the 14th of January, 1861, does not present as the ground of his resignation from the Cabinet of Mr. Buchanan the fact that he, Thomas, was opposed to the reinforcement of Fort Sumter, and the learned Senator would have us believe that the letter to which reference has been made refers solely and simply to the alleged illegality of attempting to collect the revenues at the port of Charleston out of the port; and we are told that this resignation was sent in because Secretary Thomas refused to perform such an illegal act as to collect the revenues of Charleston beyond the limits of the port of Charleston. Now, sir, on a careful inspection of this letter, with other contemporaneous documents equally authentic, it is impossible to come to anything but a directly opposite conclusion, and to hold that the great reason, and probably the sole reason, of the resignation of that Secretary, was his opposition to the project of Mr. Buchanan to reinforce Fort Sumter.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the honorable member read that part of the letter?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir; I will read enough, I trust, to satisfy the honorable Senator that I am correct. On the 8th of January, 1861, Jacob Thompson, the Secretary of the Interior, and afterward an arrant rebel as we all know, sent in his resignation to Mr. Buchanan. Keep the dates in mind, January 8 is the date of Mr. Thompson's letter of resignation, and in that letter Mr. Thompson says:

"I learn, however, this morning, for the first time, that the steamer Star of the West sailed from New York last Saturday night with two hundred and fifty men, under Lieutenant Bartlett, bound for Fort Sumter. Under these circumstances I feel myself bound to resign my commission, as one of your constitutional advisers, into your hands."

"With high respect, your obedient servant."

On the next day President Buchanan replied to the letter of Secretary Thompson, in which the President said:

"This promise was faithfully observed on my part. In order to carry it into effect I called a special Cabinet meeting on Wednesday, 2d January, 1861, in which the question of sending reinforcements to Fort Sumter was amply discussed both by yourself and others. The decided majority of opinions was against you. At this moment, to my communication to them of 31st December was received and read. It produced much indignation among the members of the Cabinet. After a further brief conversation I employed the following language: 'It is now all over, and reinforcements must be sent.' Judge Black said at the moment of my decision that after this letter the Cabinet would be unanimous, and I heard no dissenting voice. Indeed, the spirit and tone of the letter left no doubt on my mind that Fort Sumter would be immediately attacked, and hence the necessity of sending reinforcements there without delay."

The purpose of Mr. Buchanan and a majority of the Cabinet was clearly and distinctly declared as early as the 2d of January to reinforce Fort Sumter and to protect it against an anticipated attack of the rebels, and therefore Mr. Thompson on the 8th of the same month sent in his resignation. Thompson's reason is plainly expressed, and it is that reinforcements are to be sent to Fort Sumter. Three days after that we find Secretary Thomas, the present applicant presenting himself here for a seat in this body, writing to President Buchanan in the following words:

"MY DEAR SIR: It has not been in my power, as you are aware, to agree with you and with a majority of your constitutional advisers in the measures which have been adopted in reference to the present condition of things in South Carolina."

What were those "measures" relating to the "condition of things in South Carolina?" The very measures which Mr. Buchanan and a majority of the Cabinet had agreed upon. The reinforcement of Fort Sumter and its defense by force of arms against any attack of the rebels, was one of the measures at least, and it was beyond all doubt the important measure. Now, Mr. Thomas informs the President that it has not been in his power to agree with the President and a majority of his Cabinet advisers "in the measures which have been adopted in reference to the present condition of things in South Carolina;" that is to say in plain language, without circumlocution, "I was opposed to the scheme of reinforcing Fort Sumter; I preferred to let the rebels make an attack upon Fort Sumter and carry it by dint of shot and shell; and your scheme of reinforcing it for its own defense was one in which I could not concur, and therefore, because I could not concur, I resign my seat in your Cabinet." So up to this moment I can draw no distinction in point of morality or of loyalty between Jacob Thompson, afterward an arrant traitor, and Mr. Thomas, who now presents himself for a seat in this body.

But, says the Senator from Maryland, this letter related solely to the objections of Secretary Thomas against collecting the revenue out of the lines of the port of Charleston. Sir, it does not relate to that subject at all. Mr. Buchanan had not, according to the very terms of this letter, at that time resolved upon such a course. The very language contradicts it; for the language of Mr. Thomas is:

"Nor do I think it at all probable that I shall be able to concur in the views which you entertain, so far as I understand them, touching the authority, under existing laws, to enforce the collection of the customs at the port of Charleston."

There are in this letter plainly two subjects of which the writer treats. The first is the reinforcement of Fort Sumter; the second is a project, not yet agreed upon, of collecting the revenues of Charleston beyond the limits of the port. So much for that, Mr. President.

One word further. I do not know whether the learned Senator from Maryland denies as a matter of fact that the applicant called the present Congress of the United States traitors, as reported in the speech which has been read. But it is a rumor; it is true it is a newspaper rumor. That it is very generally believed cannot be doubted. If he made such an observation, if he declared the majority in Congress to be traitors, and stated that he was coming here to face traitors, it cannot reasonably be supposed that a man who entertained these views at the breaking out of the rebellion should have maintained a very scrupulous neutrality during the conflict. If in 1861 he believed Congress to be a band of traitors, bent upon the destruction of the Government by waging war against the rebel States, it would be most remarkable that, living so near the frontier where the conflict was raging, he should have abstained entirely from rendering aid and comfort to the oppressed and persecuted party. His impulses were all in that direction, and if opportunity presented, if such were his sentiments, I cannot doubt, for one, that he would have embraced that opportunity. It is for the very purpose of ascertaining how far he went in his glowing sympathy for the rebels during the war that I desire to make this inquiry. If he has lent aid and comfort to the rebellion in any degree he cannot truthfully take the oath which is prescribed to him, and is not fit to be admitted on this floor.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES. I now desire to offer a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials are in order.

Mr. GRIMES. How long does the morning hour last? Does it go beyond one o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive petitions and memorials.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of Mary Douglas, Mary Josselyn, and Mary Lancaster, widows of revolutionary soldiers, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented the memorial of Joseph A. Van Brunt, one of the owners of the bark Aug. Gaurdin, praying that an American register may be issued for that vessel; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the equalization of soldiers' bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the establishment of a mail route from Rochester to Leroy, from Glencoe to Greenleaf, from Waverly to Glencoe, from Minneapolis to Big Stone lake, and from Monticello to Waverly, all in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, presented a memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, in favor of granting the same aid to the Union Pacific railway, southern branch, as has been granted to the Union Pacific railway and its northern branches; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, relative to sales of land made by the direct tax commissioners of South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARLAN presented a memorial of late officers of the first regiment Iowa volunteer cavalry, praying payment for an alleged balance due that regiment on account of an error; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. VAN WINKLE presented the memorial of David D. Porter, vice admiral United States Navy, praying relief for the widow and children of the late Major D. P. Heap, paymaster United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORTON presented resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana, in favor of the interposition of the Government of the United States to effect the release and liberation of Rev. John McMahon, a citizen of Indiana, now in prison for an alleged violation of Canadian laws; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PAPERS REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Ordered, That the petition of Dennis Sullivan, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the petition of Captain Daniel Ellis, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant, information respecting any armed expeditions against the Indians in the western territory, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of contracts made on account of the medical department of the Army for the year 1866, reported a recommendation that the report lie on the table and be printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 19) to clothe the maimed and destitute soldiers, reported it without amendment.

WEST VIRGINIA WAR EXPENSES.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia have instructed me to report a bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to reimburse the State of West Virginia for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and paying military forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion," approved June 21, 1866.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I hope the Senate will take up for consideration the bill just reported from the Military Committee. It consists of but three lines, and is intended to supply an accidental or clerical omission in the bill relative to the war expenses of West Virginia, passed at the last Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I presume it is all right, but I should like to hear some reason for the bill.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The original act omitted to vest in the Secretary of War the power to draw warrants for any money to be paid under it; and it is thought necessary that the Secretary of War should have that power. He refuses to draw the warrants unless authority to do so is conferred by Congress. Similar bills for Missouri and other States have conferred that authority on the Secretary of War; but in the West Virginia bill that clause was accidentally omitted. As the items come under the head of military expenditures, it is simply proposed to allow the Secretary of War, at his discretion of course, to draw these warrants.

The bill (S. No. 77) was read three times, and passed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 15th instant, information in relation to the withdrawal of public lands situated between the cities of San Francisco and San José, in California, from preemption, sale, and location; which was ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 22) in relation to a certain tract of land in Burlington, Iowa;

A bill (S. No. 60) to change the name of the steamship Paonshun;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 26) providing for the necessary surveys for a ship-canal between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario for military, naval, and commercial purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 30) amending the ninth section of an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved August 30, 1852.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 10) in relation to certain coin and bullion on special deposit in the Treasury; and also that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 33) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House had passed a resolution, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested, proposing to amend the joint rules of the two Houses by providing for a joint Committee on Ordnance.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 78) authorizing the payment of the first regiment of Iowa volunteer cavalry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 79) to confirm certain sales made by the direct tax commissioners for South Carolina to persons in the Army, Navy, or Marine corps, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 80) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the Government warehouses on Atlantic Dock, Brooklyn, New York; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 81) to provide for the consolidation of the Indian tribes, and to establish a qualified territorial government in the Indian Territory; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 82) to equalize the bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the late war for the Union; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 83) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 35) to authorize the Commanding General of the Army to permit traders to remain at certain military posts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

ARMS FOR TENNESSEE.

Mr. FOWLER. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up the joint resolution directing arms to be furnished to the State of Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) directing the Secretary of War to furnish certain arms and equipments to the State of Tennessee, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The resolution was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia with two amendments. The first amendment was to strike out the preamble in these words:

Whereas the arms and equipments for the militia of the State of Tennessee were taken or destroyed by the rebel authorities during the late rebellion, and the present Executive, Governor W. G. Brownlow, in order to enforce the laws of the State, deems it necessary to employ the militia of the State for that purpose: Therefore.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the resolution "to be accounted for by the State of Tennessee to the Government of the United States;" so as to make the resolution read:

Be it resolved, &c. That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to furnish arms and equipments to the State of Tennessee, sufficient for two thousand five hundred militia, to be accounted for by the State of Tennessee to the Government of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like to hear some explanation of this resolution.

Mr. FOWLER. I will state briefly the reasons why I have offered the resolution. Governor Brownlow informs me, as I was well aware, that we are entirely destitute of arms in the State of Tennessee, and our militia need arms for various purposes, for the same purposes that they are needed in the other States, and I think we have the same right to them as other States. I asked the Secretary of War for them, and he informed me that he did not feel authorized without a resolution of Congress granting him the power to give the arms to the State; and hence the necessity for this resolution.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I believe there is some general law on this subject which applies to all the States represented in Congress, and what I desired to understand was, the particular reason applicable to the State of Tennessee; why a special measure of this kind was necessary. One thing we know, that we have United States troops in that State, and whatever of armed force is necessary for the preservation of order is, I suppose, furnished by the United States at present. I desire to know the peculiar reasons applicable to the State of Tennessee inducing the passage of a special measure applying to that State alone.

Mr. FOWLER. I think I could give the Senator the reasons in a very short time. The Governor of our State feeling in need of arms and of troops called on the Government for arms and could not receive them. He states himself the reason: the Legislature had authorized him to use troops to prosecute persons who are offending against the laws of the State, and endeavoring in a certain portion of it to overthrow the State government. They are assassinating and murdering Union men and others in the State; and for that reason the Governor of the State of Tennessee wishes these arms placed in the hands of the militia of the State to enforce the laws and preserve order there.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I do not intend to oppose the resolution; but I wish my colleague would state in what counties of the State such things as he charges have occurred, and what evidence he has of their having occurred.

Mr. FOWLER. My colleague himself knows that Senator Case and every male person in his family were assassinated for no other reason than because they were Union men. It has been done in different parts of the State; but I shall not discuss that question here. I will not take up the time of the Senate on the subject. I have given the reasons of the Governor, which were before the Secretary of War and which are in my possession, and they are adequate for my purpose. But beyond all this, the State has a right to the arms and ought to receive them.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I ask my colleague if rebels have not been shot down there as well as Union men?

Mr. FOWLER. If my colleague places himself here in the attitude of defending rebels let him do so.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. No, sir; I occupy no such position. I will interpose no obstacle in the way of the State getting arms; but I will ask my colleague if rebels have not been shot down in Tennessee as well as Union men?

Mr. FOWLER. I hope so. I believe they have been; and I think that will be perhaps the use to which the arms will be applied.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I have no objection to the arms being furnished to the State.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, it is said that the State of Tennessee is entitled to arms under the general law. We should have, then, a report from the War Department giving special reasons, giving some explanation to us why that general law is not applied in this case. Tennessee being an organized State, recognized by us as a member of the Union and represented here, is subject to the provisions of our general statute on this subject as to the distribution of arms. I have heard no reason stated why we should pass a special bill to bestow upon the authorities of that State the arms in question. We have no report from the War Department, which we ought to require in a case of this kind.

Now, as to arming the militia of that State, it is to be remembered that the general law which we passed preventing the organization of the militia in the States which were in insurrection does not apply to Tennessee. There is no prohibition on the authorities of that State to organize and arm their militia. It is not necessary, therefore, that we should pass a bill to relieve that State from the operation of the prohibition which we have made general as to all the other States which were in rebellion. It is certainly an extraordinary thing that we are called to vote a distribution of arms to the State of Tennessee when she must at present stand on the general footing of all the other States which are represented in Congress; and that we should be called upon to pass it without one word of explanation from the War Department or from the General of our armies. I shall certainly vote against this measure as it is presented to us, without some more adequate explanation than that which we have received.

Mr. FOWLER. I believe I entirely concur in the opinion of the Senator from Pennsylvania in reference to this matter generally. I will state, however, that the practical question, so far as the State of Tennessee is concerned, is this: the Governor made a call on the Secretary of War for the State's proportion of arms, and the Secretary of War informs me that he is not authorized to grant the arms. Under that state of facts—I am certain the Senator from Pennsylvania will believe my statement, although it is not in the shape of an official report from the Secretary of War—our purpose is by this resolution to get the arms, and unless this resolution be passed we cannot obtain the arms. Congress is going to adjourn shortly, and I should be very sorry to have Congress adjourn without giving authority to the State of Tennessee to obtain these arms. If we cannot obtain them from the source from which we are entitled to obtain them, of course the State will have to purchase the arms herself.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I wish it understood distinctly that I have no objection to the arms being granted to the State of Tennessee. Perhaps she is entitled to them.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As I wish to record my vote against this measure I ask for the yeas and nays on its passage. I recollect the time when the State of Delaware was deprived of every arm by the action of the Federal authorities. Arms and ammunition bought and provided by the State were taken away by the Federal authorities, and the State has never been able to recover them. If it be necessary to enforce the laws in my State, we are without arms or ammunition with which to do it. I think the State of Delaware has as much right to have her own arms and ammunition, bought by money out of her public treasury, restored to her as the State of Tennessee has to have arms and ammunition furnished to her by the Federal Government. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 39, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, and Saulsbury—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howard, Norton, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, and Trumbull—9.

So the joint resolution was passed.

LAWS OF NEW MEXICO

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) to make valid the laws of New Mexico passed at the session of the Legislature held at Santa Fé from 3d day of December, 1866, to 31st day of January, 1867, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the laws passed by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico at its last session, which began on the 3d day of December, 1866, and ending on the 31st day of January, 1867, and signed by W. F. M. Army, acting secretary and acting Governor of the Territory, shall have the same force and effect as though the same had been approved and signed by the Governor duly appointed, subject to the future revision and approval of Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is a joint resolution to declare valid the laws passed by the last session of the territorial Legislature of New Mexico. In that Territory there was no Governor last year. Under the law the secretary of the Territory acts as Governor. The secretary was removed about a year ago by the appointment of a successor; but that successor never went to New Mexico and took possession of the office, but the acting secretary, Mr. Army, continued to perform the duties of secretary, and acting as Governor he approved the laws passed by the last territorial Legislature of New Mexico. The Attorney General is of opinion that Mr. Army was not in office, although his successor had not qualified; that the removal was complete. But he actually acted. He was the acting secretary and Governor. There is a dispute as to the validity of the laws, and the territorial Legislature desire that they shall have the sanction of Congress. The joint resolution is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and I presume there will be no objection to it.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 39.

Mr. SHERMAN. As I know that bill will give rise to debate, I should like now to submit a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not think it will give rise to debate. The Committee on the District of Columbia are unanimous in favor of its passage.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am in favor of it, but I know it will give rise to debate, because the subject was debated at the last session and at one or two sessions before.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state to my friend from Ohio that it was not debated here in the Senate; there was no objection to the appropriation in the Senate; but the House of Representatives refused by a very decided vote to make the appropriation; and in the committee of conference we were compelled to give it up. I do not believe there will be any chance of getting this bill any further than through the Senate now. I think it is a very important matter, but the House manifested a fixed determination not to appropriate anything more for the aqueduct.

Mr. HARLAN. I would be very glad if the Senate would pass the bill, and if it should fail in the other House let the responsibility be with that House. I think the objection to the appropriation originally in the House was more personal to the party in charge of the work than to the appropriation itself.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to taking up the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 39) to provide means for the prosecution of the work on the distributing reservoir of the Washington aqueduct was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to appropriate $150,000 for the purpose of deepening and otherwise improving the distributing reservoir of the Washington aqueduct; but no part of the sum thus appropriated is to be used for any other purpose whatever.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask the Senator from Iowa if he will not be content with striking off $100,000, leaving the appropriation $50,000?

Mr. HARLAN. I will not, for this reason: the whole appropriation necessary to complete the distributing reservoir is estimated to be $287,000; and it is believed that $150,000 will deepen and improve and complete one half of that reservoir and construct a wall across the center of it, which would secure healthy water for the employes of the Government at the Departments, and also to a great extent guard against danger from fire, if this means of supplying water should be cut off. Fifty thousand dollars would not complete one half of the reservoir, and hence would be comparatively useless.

Mr. CONKLING. I desire to inquire of the Senator who has this bill in charge who is to have the actual expenditure of this money?

Mr. HARLAN. I only know from a newspaper statement of what was done during the last Congress. I understand that by a bill then passed the work was put under the control of the chief Engineer of the War Department.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And the whole business of overseeing the public works has been assigned to General Michler.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there no middle man, no contractor between the Government and the work?

Mr. FESSENDEN. None at all. It is all under the control of General Michler. Whether he actually expends the money or whether it is done by the Secretary of the Interior I cannot answer; but he is the man who is now in charge of all these works here.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW TRUST FUNDS.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 18) for the sale of certain stocks held in trust for the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians.

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the claims of certain Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, and other loyal persons, as are provided for in the forty-ninth and fiftieth articles of treaty concluded with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians on the 28th of April, 1866, the resolution proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell such of the stocks held by the United States in trust for the benefit of those Indians as he may deem expedient and proper; but no further sale of the stocks is to be made than may be necessary to pay these claims.

The Committee on Indian Affairs proposed to amend the resolution by adding to it:

Provided, That no such stock shall be sold and no money shall be paid on such claims, unless the Secretary of the Interior shall have first examined and ratified or approved the awards made by commissioners, as stipulated in the forty-ninth and fiftieth articles of said treaty: And provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as recommending for his approval any awards already made under said treaty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot consent to allow this measure to pass. It brings up the old question of the Choctaw and Chickasaw claims.

At the request of a party interested and others I introduced a resolution the other day referring the whole matter of the Choctaw and Chickasaw claims to the Committee on Indian Affairs with instructions to take testimony, to examine persons and papers, and to report at the next session. I do not think we ought now to interfere with these trust bonds and pay any of the debts provided for by that treaty until after a full examination. It is only one branch of a very difficult question, and as the committee have authority now to examine the matter fully and report at the next session, and their report will no doubt be decisive on the subject, I trust this resolution will be suffered to lie over. It authorizes the sale of the bonds held in trust for these Indians, which are a very large amount nominally, though some of them are of little value. It raises a very difficult question, and I trust it may lie over until the next session.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri how long the Government has held these stocks and what stocks they are?

Mr. HENDERSON. It would take me a considerable length of time to answer that question; but I can state to the Senator that these were annuity funds belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians for their lands sold in the State of Mississippi, and those funds were invested in various State and United States stocks which are held by the Secretary of the Interior, and the interest annually paid to the Indians.

Mr. MORTON. I have some knowledge of the character of these stocks and of the condition of this whole transaction, and I ask the Senator from Missouri to let this resolution lie over.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it had better go over.

Mr. HENDERSON. I shall make no objection to that; but before the question passes off I desire to say a word. Under the treaty of 1866 with the Choctaws and Chickasaws there was a provision to the effect that the President of the United States should appoint commissioners to adjust the claims of the loyal Indians who were driven out from among those tribes during the rebellion, and those commissioners were to report to the Secretary of the Interior. The President appointed the commissioners, and they went on and adjusted the claims, and then made a report to the Secretary of the Interior. That report is now lying before the Secretary. He has not yet had time to examine it. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. Ross] some time since offered this joint resolution. I went to the Secretary of the Interior to see him on the subject, and he stated that he had not yet approved the report. The treaty requires that upon the approval of the Secretary of the Interior payment shall be made from any moneys in his hands belonging to the Indians. The Secretary of the Interior has no moneys belonging to these Indians; but he has bonds of theirs in his hands, and he wishes authority, in case he shall find that the report is correct, to sell a sufficient quantity of these bonds to pay what is due to the loyal Indians. That is the whole case.

These Indians are suffering; they are poor; they were robbed of everything they had and driven out from the midst of the tribe. These bonds are on hand belonging to the tribe, and if they are sold these claims can be paid. If they are not sold the claims cannot be paid. Hence I have added a proviso to the resolution, lest our legislation should be construed by the Secretary of the Interior as indicating a desire upon our part that he should pay the claims, a proviso that no such stock shall be sold and no money paid on such claims unless the Secretary of the Interior shall first examine and approve the awards made by the commissioners, as stipulated under the forty-ninth and fiftieth articles of the treaty, and that nothing contained in the resolution shall be construed as recommending for his approval any awards already made under the treaty. If this resolution is passed it will simply have the effect of enabling the Secretary of the Interior, in case he finds the awards to be correct, to get the funds to pay them. It is claimed that we are largely indebted to the Choctaws and Chickasaws. The question has been before us several times upon Indian appropriation bills. Lately the question came up and a proposition was made to appropriate a part of the funds, but it was objected to. It is claimed that we owe them $2,000,000; but I am not prepared to say that we should appropriate any money from the Treasury. If we intend to pay the loyal Indians who have been driven out from among the tribe, there is no other way of paying them than the resolution proposes, and it ought to be passed. If the Senate wishes further consideration I am utterly indifferent to the matter, and will allow it to lie over; but I have considered it and know exactly what the question is.

Mr. MORTON. I do not desire to go into the discussion of this matter now; but I will state that there are reasons why these bonds should not be sold, independent of the question of the awards referred to in the resolution. I think I can satisfy the Senator from Missouri in a private conversation of ten minutes that these bonds ought not to be sold. I ask, therefore, that the resolution shall at least lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be postponed by common consent.

SUPPLEMENTARY RECONSTRUCTION BILL.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 33) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration.

The first amendment of the House was to insert after the words "United States," in line five of page 2, of the Senate amendment the words:

That I have never been a member of any State Legislature, nor held any executive or judicial office in any State, and afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There can be objection to that; it is an addition to the oath.

The amendment was concurred in.

The second amendment of the House was in page 5, line four, after the word "the" after it occurs the second time to insert "registered."

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the effect of that?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The effect is to require a majority of all the registered voters to adopt the constitution when it is submitted to them for ratification. While I do not mean to take up any time in objecting to this amendment, and am willing, if the Senate think proper, to concur in it and end this matter, I do not think it is right. I know there is a very strong feeling in favor of adopting the provision just as the other House has amended it, but I think it is a mistake, and I wish to say, in a word or two, why I think it a mistake. The House amendment requires for the ratification of the constitution that a majority of all the registered voters shall vote in its favor. It will be submitted at an election when there are no candidates. There will be no opposing individuals running for office, no inducements to bring men to the polls except simply to vote for or against the adoption of the constitution. Now, take the State of Georgia; suppose there are a hundred thousand voters in it, and sixty thousand of those voters are in favor of the constitution, but forty thousand against it. If those forty thousand stay away from the polls, will not the constitution be defeated?

Mr. FESSENDEN. How?

Mr. TRUMBULL. If sixty thousand are for it, you cannot get fifty thousand of them to the polls at such an election; and hence it will be defeated. I will state to the Senator from Maine what I think is the objection to this provision, and I believe he will see it at once. If the constitution is liberal, is of such a character as he and I would approve, and it is apparent that the truly loyal men; aided by the colored voters, are going to get possession of the State and form a liberal government, I apprehend that the rebels will be against it; and in that event, by staying away from the polls, under this amendment they have a greater weight than they would have by going and voting, because you can never get all the voters to the polls. Those opposed to the constitution have the benefit of the absentees.

The illustration I gave was that in Georgia if there are sixty thousand men in favor of the ratification of the constitution, I do not believe it will be possible to get fifty thousand of them to the polls, and then the forty thousand opposed to the constitution will defeat it. If, on the other hand, the constitution should be objectionable, if it should not be a liberal constitution, and you only require a majority of those voting, it will be in our hands at last and we can protect the people, for it comes to us and must be approved by us before it can be operative. This proposition, however, would put it in the hands of the disloyal to defeat a liberal constitution. I am afraid it will be in their power to defeat the reorganization of State governments in some of these States, because a majority of all the registered voters will not be got out to the polls to vote for the constitution. I know that I myself agreed to the proposition originally in this very form, for it is just the way the Committee on the Judiciary reported it, and I assented to it and I shall assent to it now if the Senate think it best, and I am willing to move that we concur in the amendment; but the discussion satisfied me that it would be better to have it the other way, and if I thought the feeling of the Senate would sustain me I would ask that the Senate disagree to the amendment. With the reflection which I have had I think its adoption is not the best course.

Mr. SHERMAN. I agree with the Senator entirely as to the impropriety of this modification; and I submit to him whether at the next session, if the constitution fairly represents the will of the people, and that is evident from the circumstances of the case, Congress can then waive this condition? This is the last act of the people there in reconstruction, and if the bill be allowed to pass in this shape, Congress may then, if it be deemed proper and expedient, waive this formality. I see no practical difficulty in the way. It is true, I think, that at the next session probably it will appear that a majority of all the registered voters have not voted for the constitution; but still we can waive that objection. I therefore see no sufficient difficulty in the way to induce us to have a controversy with the House about this matter, although I agree with the Senator as to what he has said about it.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope there will be no controversy with the House; but I hope there will be no understanding that hereafter we are to waive what we now require. I make this remark now in order that hereafter, if any proposition to waive one of these requirements shall be made, it shall be fully understood that there was a protest against it in advance.

Mr. WILLEY. I hope then, sir, if nothing is to be waived hereafter, that we shall settle the question now. The amendment of the House, it seems to me, settles the question of reconstruction under this bill; that is to say, it settles the question by leaving the States as they are. From what I know of southern sentiment, and what I know of the condition of affairs in the South, I believe most sincerely that the bill in the form in which it comes from the House will result in nothing. I do not believe that you can get a majority of the registered voters in the South upon the adoption of the constitution which will be presented to them to vote upon it either on the one side or the other. Under this proposition the secession element in the South, those who want no reconstruction, those who want to keep the Union element in the South still under the ban and under the foot of their oppression, can accomplish it simply by non-action, and they will do it. On the other hand, it will be found, in the practical operation of matters there, that on a vote on this question it will be impossible to bring more than two thirds of the negro voters to the polls. By the time when this proposition shall be presented to them they will not have been sufficiently educated as regards their duty in the premises to know exactly what to do. About the towns, about the villages, about the military posts they can be instructed, and they can be brought to the polls; but in the interior of the country, upon the plantations, I will venture the assertion, and affirm it here, it will be found in the result of the experiment that the influence of their employers still remaining upon them will prevent a large proportion of the field hands from coming to the polls at all. I will further venture the assertion that the secession element, those who want no reconstruction, those who want no practical relations with the Union, will prevent the adoption of any constitution which will be presented to them at the election contemplated in this bill.

Therefore, sir, desiring as I do to see those States, as speedily as may be practicable, restored to their practical relations, I shall feel constrained to vote against this proposition. I would prefer to see the simple bill of last session, without this supplementary bill at all, presented to the southern people, believing that the negroes and the loyal sentiment in primary assemblies would in a shorter time organize governments in the southern States than they will be organized under the operation of this bill if it is allowed to remain as it is. The bill, if passed as it is, settles the question, not of reconstruction, but of non-reconstruction. You will have no practical relations restored to the government of the southern States under the operations of this bill, in my opinion.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I regret very much that this amendment has been made. I think that it is a great mistake, made not in the interest of reconstruction, and not in the interest of the friends of the principles upon which reconstruction is based; that its practical operation will be against the friends of reconstruction upon these principles and not for them. In other words, I think the amendment is in the interest of those who are opposed to the reconstruction of these States on the terms and conditions proposed by Congress.

Sir, who to-day in these States are opposing reconstruction upon the terms we have proposed? The old rebel chiefs and leaders. Howell Cobb was here weeks ago, and went home to Georgia the other day, and advised the people of Georgia to have nothing to do with it. Other rebel leaders there are giving the same counsel. It is so in other States. Who is fighting the battle there for reconstruction and acquiescing in the terms and conditions we have proposed? Governor Brown came here this winter with other leading men from that State, consulted with the friends of the constitutional amendment and the friends of negro suffrage, heard their views, heard what they had to say, and went home with the resolution to do all he could in favor of acquiescing in the terms and conditions Congress might propose; and he seized the earliest moment that he could to advise the people of Georgia to acquiesce in the constitutional amendment.

Now, sir, who are to carry it out? Who are the men that will do it? It will be the men who are in favor of the constitutional amendment, men who are in favor of negro suffrage, men who are in favor of making the constitutions of these States in harmony with the terms and conditions and principles we have laid down.

We all know that this bill came in here for the purpose of carrying out the measure of the last Congress in favor of reconstruction. We know that that measure was proposed by the friends of the country and of the equal rights of all men, the friends of enfranchising the black man and of weaponing his hand for defense; the friends of taking the governments of these rebel States out of the hands of their rebel possessors, and giving the whole people, including the seven hundred thousand enfranchised black men, the right to reconstruct their own local governments, and to fill those governments with truly loyal men. We all know that the measure was introduced for that purpose. We know that from the Potomac to the Rio Grande the loyal white men, the colored men whom we have enfranchised, and the repentant and fair-minded rebels, the men who mean to be with the country in the future, accept the terms and conditions we propose, and are willing to go into the elections, willing and desirous of organizing their States and complying with all that we demand. In face of that fact and of the fact that the rebel leaders all through the South know that this action will take these States out of their control, that their Governors, their Legislatures, and their leaders must go out of office, that men who hold views contrary to their own must take the control of those States if they are reorganized, in view of the fact that these men are counseling non-action, taking no part in the contest or opposing what we do, this Congress of the United States proposes to give these rebels the advantage of counting everybody who will stay at home.

Mr. President, I say the proposition is the most extraordinary proposition that ever emanated from a body of practical or sensible men. It is a proposition to enable the rebel leaders to take advantage of all the persons who are hostile to these terms and all the persons who cannot go to the polls to vote. We know that in a great presidential election, in a great political struggle, not more than four fifths of all the votes are cast. Take the elections of 1860 and 1864, and not more than four fifths of the votes were cast. Georgia has been referred to by the Senator from Illinois. Georgia has from two hundred to two hundred and twenty-five thousand voters; say two hundred thousand. One fifth of that number, forty thousand will not, under any spur and circumstances, go to the ballot-box. That leaves one hundred and sixty thousand who will vote. Now, we require that the vote shall be over one hundred thousand in order to carry the constitution when it is made; and it has got to be made. We have declared that it shall be made, and these conventions will not make any constitutions that do not comply with our terms. I say the constitution must be made in accordance with the principles we have laid down. They must, they will comply if they are made at all. If the enemies of this reconstruction policy obtain the control of a convention they may make nothing at all; but they will make no constitution and send it here or think of sending it here unless it accepts the great fundamental principles we have laid down.

Now, sir, I venture to say it will require a most extraordinary exertion to obtain a majority of the whole vote in any one of these States to carry one of these constitutions after they are made. If it was submitted to the people of my State with that requirement, the chances would not be one in a thousand to carry it. I do not believe there is a constitution in the country, unless it was adopted on the day of a general election, that ever received a majority of the votes of a State. I venture to say there is not a loyal State in the Union framing a constitutional amendment and submitting it to a vote of the people, unless it be on the day of general election, which brings out the people for the election of their public officers, where it would bring one half the voters to the polls.

As I said the other day, the State of New York is to elect delegates on the fourth Monday of April, I understand, to a constitutional convention. Then will be the great contest as to who shall control that convention. There will be rival candidates for delegates. All the interest and passions of parties will be aroused. The interest of individuals will be aroused. New York will be canvassed all over. Men will be brought to the polls. Money will be expended to bring out the lame and the halt and the stay-at-homes. There will be a great vote, and it will determine the character of that convention. But let the convention frame a constitution, and especially if it be one generally acceptable to the people, and submit it to the people on any other day than the day of their general election, and not one fourth of the people of New York will go to the ballot-box and vote for or against it. That is our constitutional history. If you will take the history from 1789 to this time and examine the votes given for the adoption of constitutions and the votes given on constitutional amendments, you will find that the popular votes have always been very small.

I think this whole policy tends against prompt reconstruction. I am free to say that considering all the condition of the country; considering that we have triumphed in our principles; considering the liability that we have that a State may drop off here, and if it does it may be construed by these rebel leaders as the beginning of a reaction; considering the fact that the President of the United States is hostile to our policy; considering the fact, or what is said to be a fact, that the Supreme Court is hostile to it; considering the fact that Congress has dictated all the terms and conditions, and that this is complying with those terms and conditions, I say, sir, that the policy is made against our friends and not for our friends. That is my own deliberate conviction on the subject.

While there are some questions of law on which I never feel at liberty to express an opinion, yet on a question of this character I choose always to follow my own convictions, because I think I am about as well acquainted with these matters as most of the men who surround me. I have for two years consulted with loyal men in the South, with the representatives of black men, with rebels of all stripes and kinds. I have endeavored, as far as I could, to post myself up on the condition of those States, and to act upon the policy of bringing them in here at the earliest possible moment when we can do so in harmony to carry out our principles. I want them to do our work. I want them to aid in completing this great cause. Therefore, I want our friends to take these States; and if they have any capacity for organization, any capacity to use the power that is in their hands, they can control these States; they can elect the conventions; they can frame their constitutions; they can make them in harmony with us; and when they have done that, they can elect in several of these States, and I think a majority of them, men who will come here true to the country and who believe in the principles embodied in the constitutional amendment and in their own revised constitutions.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I see that this matter is to keep us here till midnight. Gentlemen are making their old speeches over again. I have not heard a new idea suggested in this discussion. I think we may as well go into executive session, and I therefore move to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Oh, no.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We may as well. We shall not get through with this matter till midnight. We have got to hear the whole debate over again.

Mr. TRUMBULL and Mr. SHERMAN. Let us take a vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If we can take a vote I will withdraw my motion; but I do not want to stay here until midnight again to hear the same things over and over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not rise to debate it. The patience of my friend from Maine I am sure will not be exhausted by the time I shall occupy. I voted for the original bill, or the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, from a sincere desire to have the States back on almost any terms. I would not be in favor of negro suffrage if I was permitted to vote upon that question alone; but I believe that the interest of the country requires that the States should be back, even requiring negro suffrage. I concur with the honorable member from Massachusetts in thinking that if this amendment is sanctioned the whole measure will be defeated. It would have been rather better, or rather much less likely to be defeated, if a majority of all the registered voters should be required in the beginning to decide whether there should be a convention or not; but we have required only a majority of a majority for that purpose. If the convention who may be elected in that way decide that the constitution shall be adopted, then the question submitted to the people is a single question of constitution or no constitution; and my word for it, upon that question not one half of the registered voters will go to the polls. The result will be that those who are in favor of negro suffrage, in which I class, as I suppose without offending, my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] will be defeated in their object. They cannot have it hereafter unless they get it now. If you pass the bill in the form in which it passed this body I think it will be accepted, and the effect of that acceptance would be to secure that suffrage in all the southern States; but if you leave them to choose for themselves, either by an actual vote or by refusing to vote, whether there shall be that suffrage or not, the suffrage will not be extended to the blacks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know but that I must insist on my motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Nobody else wants to make a speech.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us have a vote.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on concurring in the amendment. I want to record my vote against it.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe my motion is in order to go into executive session. I have not withdrawn it. I see the debate is going on precisely as I supposed it would, and we are to have the same thing over and over again. I do not want to stay here until midnight.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not intend, as the Senator from Maine intimates, to make over again any speech that I have made heretofore in regard to this particular question; but I wish to say before the vote is taken that I am sincere and in earnest in voting for this bill as it passed the Senate, from a desire that these southern States shall be, at as early a day as may be consistent with the public interest, under a compliance with the law as it now stands, readmitted to their places in the Union. I do very sincerely desire that when they choose to form constitutions in accordance with the requirements of Congress they shall be allowed to come back; and I have a very profound regret that the House of Representatives should have interposed to the passage of this bill what I believe is to be a fatal obstacle probably in several of those States to the whole plan of reconstruction.

There would have been very good reasons for requiring the vote of a majority of all the registered voters at the outset, when the registration shall have been just completed; but to postpone it to the last stage, when you never can get a vote upon the mere question of adopting a constitution such as you can get upon the election of delegates to a convention, and when every man whose name stands on the register and who shall have died in the mean time, and every man whose name is on that register and who shall have removed from the State in the mean time, is to be counted against the constitutions, as well as those who choose to stay at home—when they have put it in this shape, I think they have planted there one of the greatest obstacles to reconstruction that could be put there; and, sir, I am constrained to believe that it was intended to plant that obstacle there.

If the Senate really means to open the way for reconstruction, then the only course it has is to refuse to concur in this amendment, and to refuse to the end. I would rather refuse it now and go home and come back next fall or next winter and take the sense of the country upon this proposition than to agree to this thing now.

For these reasons, whenever the question comes up on concurring in that amendment I shall vote against concurrence, and I do hope that every Senator who really desires to see the southern States reconstructed under the principles that we have laid down will vote the same way.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There is no member of this body who always listens with more pleasure than myself to the speeches made by the honorable and distinguished chairman of the Military Committee of this body, [Mr. WILSON.] Sometimes in my own State, after he has been there to enlighten us upon political questions and how we should cast our votes, I have been asked how was it possible for men who differed so widely in political opinions and whose actions in the Senate are controlled, if not by so opposite motives, by such opposite ideas, should have such personal respect for each other, and I have said to my people, I respect an honest man wherever I find him, and I think the Senator from Massachusetts is an honest and frank man.

I find him to-day, sir, the open and avowed advocate for negro suffrage. My mind has been refreshed from some little review of his record. I find him during the last political campaign visiting the great State of New York, and at a town or a city (I do not know whether it be a town or a city) called Yonkers telling them that negro suffrage was not in controversy. If my memory serves me right, he visited the State of New Jersey, and he enunciated the same truth. He visited the State of Delaware; he made several political speeches in that State; and we were assured, according to the record of his speeches published in the newspapers, that that was not a question in the political issue. The elections were decided against the Democrats and in favor of the party of which the honorable Senator is so distinguished a member. I find now that it is claimed that that question was decided in those political campaigns. I ask the honorable Senator if negro suffrage was wrong prior to the last general election, was not an issue, how it has become right since, and how it is now right.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say to the Senator, without taking up any time of the body, that at all times, on all occasions, from the beginning, I have been in favor of negro suffrage pure and simple, manhood suffrage, and have given everybody here and everywhere else, who cares anything about my opinions, to understand that that was my opinion. The speech to which he refers was a simple declaration that the Republican party in that State had not accepted that as an issue in the canvass; but everybody knew very well what my opinions were, and I was not backward in telling them.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then all I have got to say in reply is, that the Republican party is, as it professes to be, a progressive party.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I take the liberty to make a suggestion touching the question under consideration, and that is this amendment. The objection to it is that the voters will not come out on the simple question of ratifying the constitution. It will be perfectly proper for the constitutional convention that frames the constitution to provide by an ordinance that the election for State officers under the new government should take place on the same day that the constitution is submitted to the people. That is not unusual in new States. I think it highly desirable when these constitutions come here that we should have something more than the parchment. We should know into whose hands actually the government is going; we should know the men and their history who are elected by the people. It will be a pretty good sign as to the status of these new communities. Therefore the objection made by my friend from Massachusetts that nobody will come out can be entirely gotten rid of, because you can have a proper, and in my judgment a necessary election of State officers, which will induce everybody to come out, and one which I think ought to be had before we undertake to approve these constitutions and send them back we do not know to whom.

Mr. MORTON. Before the vote is taken I desire to enter my protest against this amendment made by the House. It has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts, and I agree with him entirely, that although not so intended, it is an amendment in the interest of rebels who are opposed to reconstruction. It provides that every sick man, every lazy man, every man who is too busy to go to the polls, every sullen rebel, and every friend of reconstruction who by any cause is kept from going to the polls, shall be counted as voting against the constitution. I have heard no man express the opinion that he believed, upon a naked election held for the purpose of ratifying a constitution, a majority of all the registered voters would be brought to the polls; and thus the constitution might fail, although perhaps there was an actual majority in the State in favor of ratifying it, and although four fifths of all the voters who felt inclined or felt willing or took interest enough in the matter to go to the polls should vote in favor of the ratification.

Let me ask the distinguished Senators who are in favor of this amendment what will be the effect in these rebel States if in the course of this year or the fore part of next year elections shall be held and these constitutions shall fail of ratification for want of a majority of all the registered voters? Then the whole work falls to the ground. There is no provision in either of these bills for undertaking a second convention or a second constitution, and we are in a much worse condition than we are now.

In my opinion, it is unreasonable to permit the men who stay at home from any cause to be counted against those who go to the polls. As has been said, we know from actual experience, every intelligent man knows that in every election, I do not care how much excitement there may be—take the great election of 1864, between Lincoln and McClellan—there are thousands of men who fail to go to the polls. In my own State there were thousands of the friends of Mr. Lincoln, who from various causes failed to go to the election; and so it was in the other States. We do not require this principle in the most important elections. We do not conduct any of the business of life, in corporations, in deliberative assemblies of any kind, on this principle.

Mr. POMEROY. We do in corporations.

Mr. MORTON. It is suggested that we do in corporations. So far as the construction of deliberative bodies is concerned, like this, or a House of Delegates, we may fix a certain number and require that to be a quorum; but it is a stated body where men are appointed to go and meet for an express purpose, and clothed with authority. It bears no comparison whatever to an election, to the idea of requiring a quorum in an election. In the States where they required a majority vote it has been found to be inconvenient, and I believe has now been abolished in all. In some of the States it was formerly required that a candidate should receive a majority of all the votes cast, and if he did not there was no election. It was found to be inconvenient, that it could not be continued, and it has been changed.

Sir, the idea of permitting all the men who stay at home from indifference, hatred, sickness, sullenness, laziness, ignorance, or any cause to be counted against the constitution, seems to me to be unreasonable. It will be said that this clause has been put in for the very purpose of enabling the enemies of reconstruction to avail themselves of the absence of men from whatever cause to defeat reconstruction, and thus by defeating reconstruction continue in power these existing rebel governments that we have so bitterly denounced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DRAKE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest that instead of taking the question on concurring, we insist and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order.

Mr. WILSON. It can be done by general consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

Mr. DRAKE. The question now is simply on concurrence, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the question.

Mr. NYE. I paired off with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] on all questions pertaining to this bill where our votes would disagree. I do not know how he would vote upon this question if he were here.

Mr. JOHNSON. He would vote against the amendment.

Mr. NYE. Then I shall not vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 21, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, Henderson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, and Yates—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Crain, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Johnson, Morton, Norton, Ramsey, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Davis, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howard, Nye, Riddle, and Sprague—8.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate insist on its disagreement and ask for a committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not in order. The next amendment will be reported.

The Secretary read the third amendment of the House of Representatives, which was after the word "specified" in line five of page 5 of the Senate amendment, to strike out the words "cast at said election, [at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification.]"

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is a part of the previous amendment really, and ought to be disagreed to according to the last vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. But it is in a different part of the bill. Of course everybody will vote against this who voted against the other.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is in the same part of the bill. The word "registered" came in in the line previous, and this follows. It is all one amendment, but we are voting twice. We ought to disagree to this.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The fourth amendment of the House was to add the following proviso to section 6 of the Senate amendment:

Provided, That if any person shall knowingly and falsely take and subscribe any oath in this act prescribed, such person so offending, and being thereof duly convicted, shall be subject to the pains, penalties, and disabilities which by law are provided for the punishment of the crime of willful and corrupt perjury.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I believe all the House amendments are now disposed of. I suppose it is not necessary to ask for a committee of conference; our action can go back to the House, and they can then take action.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is there not an amendment with regard to the holders of office in the State of Virginia? Has that been acted upon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no other amendment. All the House amendments have been disposed of.

The SPEAKER stated that the remainder of the morning hour would be consumed in calling States for resolutions, commencing with the State of Ohio, where the call was suspended.

Mr. SCHENCK submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the following be added to the joint rules of the two Houses, namely:

RULE — There shall be appointed a joint committee on ordinance, to consist of three members of the Senate and three members of the House, to whom shall be referred all matters in relation to ordinance and ordinance stores and small-arms which shall come in question and be referred to them by either House; and also to inquire into the expenditures of the ordinance bureaus of the War and Navy Departments, and to report from time to time such measures in reference to those subjects as to the said committee may seem advisable.

Mr. CHANLER. Is that in order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CHANLER. Is it divisible?

The SPEAKER. It is not divisible. In order to make a resolution divisible each part must be able to stand by itself if the other part should be rejected. If the first part of the resolution were rejected the other part would be a nullity.

Mr. CHANLER. Is an amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. Not during the call for the previous question.

Mr. BURR. Does the resolution contemplate the immediate appointment of the committee?

The SPEAKER. It does if the Senate concur.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BARQUE JANE C. WOODRUFF.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I submit the following joint resolution, and call for the previous question:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue a certificate of registry or enrollment and license to the barque Jane C. Woodruff, now owned by Denison Steele, of Toledo, Ohio, and George Berriman, of Erie, Pennsylvania, citizens of the United States: Provided, That there shall be paid on the materials used in the construction of said vessel of foreign manufacture a tax equal to the internal revenue tax.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I hope the gentleman will let me move the following as a substitute:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue certificates of registry or enrollment and license to the vessel Jane C. Woodruff and the schooner Alpha, of Hamilton: Provided, That there shall be paid on each of said vessels a tax equal to the internal revenue tax upon materials and construction of similar vessels of American build.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. As the gentleman was a member of the Committee on Commerce, I accept the amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. A great number of petitions were presented during the last Congress in reference to this subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If we pass any bill it should be a general one. I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. It is a copy of a resolution passed at the last session.

Mr. HOLMAN moved that the joint resolution be laid on the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 30.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object to its reference to the Committee on Commerce when appointed.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. BINGHAM submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the members of the Military Committee of the Thirty-Ninth Congress who are re-elected to the Fortieth Congress are hereby authorized and directed to prosecute, during the recess, the investigation into the management and general administration of the West Point Military Academy, which was ordered at the late session, and which was not undertaken for want of time; that they be empowered to send for persons and papers, and to employ a clerk at the rate of compensation paid to the clerk of the Military Committee.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 38; no quorum voting.

The Chair ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. BINGHAM and UPSON.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes ten, noes not counted.

So the question was not seconded.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Debate arising, the resolution goes over.

BOOKS AND PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. ECKLEY. I offer the following resolution, and demand the previous question thereon:

Resolved, That all books and public documents, except the Congressional Globe, of which extra copies have been ordered to be printed for distribution, and which have not been delivered to the persons entitled thereto under the resolution of the last House of Representatives, shall now be delivered by the officers having possession of the same to the Representatives in this House of those districts whose former Representatives have not drawn the documents to which such districts were respectively entitled, according to the rate of distribution established.

Mr. LAFLIN. Will the gentleman withdraw the demand for the previous question?

Mr. ECKLEY. I do not.

Mr. UPSON. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

On laying the resolution on the table there were—ayes 33, noes 60.

Mr. KELLEY. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. KELLEY and ECKLEY.

Mr. PAINE. I ask unanimous consent to have read a letter on this subject by Hon. Mr. Hart, a late member of the House.

Mr. JUDD. I object.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I rise to a question of privilege in connection with this subject. One week ago to-day a resolution of precisely the same kind was before the House, being introduced by my colleague, [Mr. ECKLEY.] The reporter of the Associated Press, by mistake, gave me the credit for introducing it. I desire to say that I was absent in New York on that day and the credit should have been given to my colleague. I am opposed to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of privilege.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 33, noes 62.

Mr. UPSON. I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 46, nays 69, not voting 48; as follows:

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The question recurred on seconding the previous question.

Mr. BROOMALL. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. BROOMALL and BUCKLAND.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 29.

So the previous question was seconded. The main question was then ordered.

Mr. UPSON. I demand the yeas and nays on agreeing to the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 67, nays 48, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Baker, Banks, Blaine, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Butler, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dodge, Eckley, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Gravely, Hamilton, Hayes, Holman, Hopkins, Asahel W. So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ECKLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution in regard to the duty of the joint Committee on Retrenchment.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed bill of the House No. 33, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration, with an amendment, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the House No. 10, in relation to certain coin and bullion on deposit in the Treasury, with an amendment, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. R. No. 22) declaring the meaning of the second section of the act of March 2, 1867, relating to property lost in the military service, and an act (S. No. 61) to provide for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska; and in both of which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

FENIAN INVASION OF CANADA.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House such information as he may have of the results of the late trials of citizens of the United States under the charge of complicity in the so-called Fenian invasion of that Province.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs whether his committee designs to make any report in regard to the resolution referred to that committee expressive of sympathy with the Irish republic and the pending rebellion in Ireland?

Mr. BANKS. I will answer that question when another resolution which I hold in my hand is disposed of.

WITHDRAWAL OF FRENCH TROOPS.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, the latest official information which may have been received in regard to the withdrawal of French troops from the Mexican republic.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] now answer the question which I asked a few minutes ago?

Mr. BANKS. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have had under consideration the matter referred to them, but I am not authorized to make a final report now. Other meetings will be held, and before an adjournment takes place I shall have an opportunity to make a statement on this question.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY,] made on Monday last, to suspend the rules in order to enable him to submit a resolution in relation to the Fenian movements in Ireland.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

LIQUOR IN THE CAPITOL.

The first business on the Speaker's table was a concurrent resolution of the Senate, to amend the nineteenth joint resolution of the two Houses to prevent the sale or use of liquors in the Capitol building or grounds adjacent thereto.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the nineteenth joint rule of the two Houses be amended so as to read as follows, namely:

No spirituous or malt liquors, or wines, shall be offered for sale, exhibited, or kept within the Capitol, or in any room or building connected therewith, or on the public grounds adjacent thereto. And it shall be the duty of the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses, under the supervision of the Presiding Officers thereof, respectively, to enforce the foregoing provisions. And any officer or employé of either House who shall in any manner violate, or connive at the violation of this rule, shall be dismissed from office.

The question was upon concurring in the resolution.

Mr. BLAINE. Before the vote is taken upon concurring in this resolution I deem it proper to state that for four years past, during the time I have had the honor of a seat in this House and you, Mr. Speaker, have had the honor of presiding over this House, there has been no liquor sold in this end of the Capitol. I am perfectly willing to help the Senate expel liquor from their end of the Capitol building; but we do not need the reform over here. The resolution was concurred in.

ISSUES BY TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was a concurrent resolution of the Senate relative to the duties of the joint Committee on Retrenchment.

The concurrent resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the joint Committee on Retrenchment be, and are hereby, instructed to make a careful and minute examination of the method adopted by the Treasury Department to print the bonds, notes, and securities of the United States, what guards have been adopted to prevent fraud or mistake, and what additional guards, if any, ought to be adopted to prevent fraud or mistake; whether there has been any fraudulent or erroneous issue of bonds, notes, or coupons, and if so, by whose fault or negligence, and the proper remedy and prevention thereof; and especially to examine into the official conduct of those charged with the printing, registration, and issuing of any notes, bonds, or securities of the United States; and that said committee have power to sit during the recess of Congress, to send for persons and papers, to examine the same, and to take testimony, and report at the next session of Congress.

Mr. COVODE obtained the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Inasmuch as this resolution will probably give rise to discussion, I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] to allow me to move to lay aside this concurrent resolution for the present.

Mr. COVODE. I would prefer to have the resolution disposed of at this time, inasmuch as a few days ago I made a motion to have a select committee appointed to investigate certain charges made on this floor and elsewhere with regard to malfeasance in the Treasury Department.

This resolution of the Senate comes before us in such a shape as to postpone the settlement of this question until after the meeting of the next session of Congress. Now, if it be true that fraudulent or irregular issues of fractional currency, or bonds, or other issues of the Government have been made from the Treasury, or that Government bonds or coupons have been duplicated, (and it is admitted that duplicate coupons have come in and been redeemed,) the sooner this question is looked into and that bureau of the Department shut up the better. The postponement of this investigation until the next session of Congress will give the individual who is charged with this practice an opportunity of going on issuing as many spurious or duplicate bonds as he may see fit. The people of this country want to know whether the bonds they may have in their possession are genuine or not. It has been admitted that coupons of duplicate bonds have been presented and redeemed.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] what authority he has for saying that it is conceded that spurious or duplicate bonds have been issued? It was stated in the debate in the Senate a day or two ago that the allegation that fraudulent bonds have been issued was a mistake.

Mr. COVODE. A gentleman from New York, a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, who gave attention to this matter, stated in his seat on one of the last evenings of the last session that there had been duplicate bonds issued, and also an overissue of fractional currency, if I understood him aright. Now, Mr. Speaker, this statement has gone abroad, and it is time that the public mind should be set at rest on this question.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman state for the information of the House the amount in money of those bonds and that spurious currency?

Mr. COVODE. From Mr. Colby's letter I understand that there have been such coupons to the amount of $16,000 taken up, and his statement does not come down to the present date, but only to the 1st of November last. We have no evidence with regard to what number of spurious duplicates have been redeemed since November 1, 1866.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he is not aware that the interest account at the Treasury balances to day? If there had been a spurious issue of bonds it would be detected in balancing the accounts at the Treasury.

Mr. COVODE. I am not aware of that. I am advised this morning from the highest source that the investigation with regard to this question has not been gone through with, and the report has not been made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he means to declare here that it has been acknowledged or discovered that any spurious bonds at all have been issued? Are the alleged irregularities anything more than a mere duplication of numbers? Does the gentleman say that there is any evidence that there has been an issue of spurious bonds to the amount of $16,000?

Mr. COVODE. I have already said that the gentleman from New York stated that there had been—

Mr. GARFIELD. An issue of spurious bonds?

Mr. COVODE. Duplicate bonds.

Mr. GARFIELD. Ah, that is quite a different thing.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I think that the gentleman from Pennsylvania rather overstates the remark to which he refers as having been made by the gentleman from New York. I think that gentleman spoke only of some irregularities with regard to the records; but since this question has come up, within the last few days I have taken particular pains to look into this matter at the Treasury Department; and the Register, Mr. Colby, stated to me that up to this time the whole amount of counterfeit or altered coupons, or coupons in which any irregularity has been detected, is but $16,000. He showed me a detailed statement, by which it appeared that seven eighths of those coupons were not printed at the Treasury Department, but were printed by the Bank Note Company.

Mr. SCOFIELD. With the consent of my colleague, [Mr. COVODE,] I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there are $16,000 of coupons or $16,000 of bonds?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Sixteen thousand dollars of coupons. All the coupons in regard to which there was any irregularity amounted to $16,000.

Mr. SCOFIELD. That would make the amount of the bonds to which the coupons belonged something over half a million dollars.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. A great many of them were coupons of bonds undoubtedly regular, in regard to which it could be traced where they had been altered. The supposition is that parties may have stolen these coupons, and then changed the numbers in order to prevent their being traced through advertisements or by detectives having knowledge of the numbers stolen.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I was not interrupting to throw any suspicion upon the Treasury. In making the inquiry my object was to ascertain the amount supposed to be irregular. If there are $16,000 of irregular coupons, then we would have something over half a million of bonds in all.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. But these were not, as I will state, irregularities of bonds. There was no evidence of any such irregularity. In many cases it was in numbering the coupons. These coupons are numbered by a machine, and in several instances it was evidently an error. For instance, there would be two of 941, none of 942, and the next number would be 943. There was no evidence of overissue or fraudulent issue of bonds by the Department.

Mr. COVODE. If the member from Massachusetts is right in his suggestion, it would be better for all of the parties connected with the Treasury to have it made a matter of record. We should have the testimony regularly taken and spread before the country, so that the public mind may be put at rest. I will say, what every gentleman knows, that it is not at rest to-day on these questions.

Mr. O'NEILL. I am one who should like to see the public mind at rest, but my impression is this is not the way to accomplish it. This constant agitation of the same matter is rather calculated to produce unrest. Now, I ask my colleague whether in the circle of his acquaintance he has ever known of any man, woman, or child who held invalid bonds?

Mr. COVODE. There is no telling who has a genuine bond or who has a spurious one, or rather who has a duplicate bond. There is no question or doubt but they were made upon the same plate; and of the gentleman who is in charge of this Department every gentleman in this House has been suspicious, probably for years, of his character. I have had these suspicions myself for twelve years. It is and has been a matter of astonishment that he should be retained in a position the most important, perhaps, connected with the revenues of the country.

Mr. O'NEILL. One word more. I wish to say generally, in the first place, that for one I am opposed to any further skirmishing with the finances of the country; and next, in reply to my colleague, I will venture the statement that in the community from which I come, which has been one of the heaviest purchasers of United States bonds and securities, there is not a man, woman, or child who has received a fraudulently issued bond, or who has lost by any counterfeit bond. If there has been any such case I have not heard of it.

I learn to-day from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER,] as I learned the other day from the public prints, that the total amount of irregularities is $16,000, and these irregularities chiefly arise from errors in printing. I hope the gentleman's resolution will not prevail.

Mr. COVODE. I will not yield again until I have concluded what little I have risen to say.

Now, sir, if there be no person hit by this proposed investigation then why all this fluttering? If I were at the head of this Department I would hasten the investigation and as soon as possible quiet the public mind. I should be unwilling to let the matter go over the summer till next December, so as to leave power still in the hands of corrupt men, if any there be, to issue false and fraudulent currency and securities. I do not understand these parties object to the investigation; why then do gentlemen rise up here and make objection? The head of the Department does not object to it. I deem it to be a duty that this investigation should proceed. I move, if in order, my resolution for the resolution of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to move a House resolution for a Senate concurrent resolution.

Mr. COVODE. I gave notice on last Thursday I would introduce my resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. I demand the previous question on the Senate resolution.

Mr. CHANLER. What does the gentleman from Pennsylvania propose to do if he finds the fraud as extensive as he says?

Mr. COVODE. If the frauds are as extensive as I have been induced to believe they are, I would lock up that Department and stop making spurious money within three days.

Mr. BINGHAM. I insist upon the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. COVODE. I call for the yeas and nays on concurring in the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The concurrent resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT OF THE REBEL STATES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of the amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 33, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration.

The amendment of the Senate was reported, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: That before the 1st day of September, 1867, the commanding general in each district defined by an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, shall cause a registration to be made of the male citizens of the United States, twenty-one years of age and upward, resident in each county or parish in the State or States included in his district, which registration shall include only those persons who are qualified to vote for delegates by the act aforesaid, and who shall have taken and subscribed the following oath or affirmation: "I, _____, do solemnly swear, (or affirm,) in the presence of Almighty God, that I am a citizen of the State of _____; that I have resided in said State for _____ months next preceding this day, and now reside in the county of _____, or the parish of _____, in said State, (as the case may be); that I am twenty-one years old; that I have not been disfranchised for participation in any rebellion or civil war against the United States, nor for felony committed against the laws of any State or of the United States; that I have never taken an oath as a member of Congress of the United States, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, and afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof; that I will faithfully support the Constitution and obey the laws of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, encourage others so to do: so help me God," which oath or affirmation may be administered by any registering officer.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That after the completion of the registration hereby provided for in any State, at such time and places therein as the commanding general shall appoint and direct, of which at least thirty days' public notice shall be given, an election shall be held of delegates to a convention for the purpose of establishing a constitution and civil government for such State loyal to the Union; said convention in each State, except Virginia, to consist of the same number of members as the most numerous branch of the State Legislature of such State in the year 1860, to be apportioned among the several districts, counties, or parishes of such State by the commanding general, giving to each representation in the ratio of voters registered as aforesaid as nearly as may be. The convention in Virginia shall consist of the same number of members as represented the territory now constituting Virginia in the most numerous branch of the Legislature of said State in the year 1860, to be apportioned as aforesaid.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That at said election the registered voters of each State shall vote for or against a convention to form a constitution therefor under this act. Those voting in favor of such a convention shall have written or printed on the ballots by which they vote for delegates as aforesaid the words, "For a convention," and those voting against such a convention shall have written or printed on such ballots the words, "Against a convention." The persons appointed to superintend said election and to make return of the votes given thereat, as herein provided, shall count and make return of the votes given for and against a convention; and the commanding general to whom the same shall have been returned shall ascertain and declare the total vote in each State for and against a convention. If a majority of the votes given on that question shall be for a convention, then such convention shall be held as hereinafter provided; but if a majority of said votes shall be against a convention, then no such convention shall be held under this act: Provided, That such convention shall not be held unless a majority of all such registered voters shall have voted on the question of holding such convention.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the commanding general of each district shall appoint such loyal officers or persons as may be necessary, not exceeding three in each election district in any State, to make and complete the registration, superintend the election, and make return to him of the votes, lists of voters, and of the persons elected as delegates by a plurality of the votes cast at said election; and upon receiving said returns he shall open the same, ascertain the persons elected as delegates according to the returns of the officers who conducted said election, and make proclamation thereof; and if a majority of the votes given on that question shall be for a convention, the commanding general, within sixty days from the date of election, shall notify the delegates to assemble in convention, at a time and place to be mentioned in the notification, and said convention, when organized, shall proceed to frame a constitution and civil government according to the provisions of this act, and the act to which it is supplementary; and when the same shall have been so framed, said constitution shall be submitted by the convention for ratification to the persons registered under the provisions of this act at an election to be conducted by the officers or persons appointed by the commanding general, as hereinbefore provided, and to be held after the expiration of thirty days from the date of notice thereof, to be given by said convention; and the returns thereof shall be made to the commanding general of the district.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the electors qualified as herein specified, cast at said election, (at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification, the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session, then immediately upon its next assembling; and if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as therein provided.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That all elections in the States mentioned in the said act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States, shall, during the operation of said act, be by ballot; and all officers making the said registration of voters and conducting said elections shall, before entering upon the discharge of their duties, take and subscribe an oath faithfully to perform the duties of their said office, and the oath prescribed by the act approved July 2, 1862, entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office."

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That all expenses incurred by the several commanding generals, or by virtue of any orders issued, or appointments made by them, under or by virtue of this act, shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the convention for each State shall prescribe the fees, salary, and compensation to be paid to all delegates and other officers and agents herein authorized or necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act not herein otherwise provided for, and shall provide for the levy and collection of such taxes on the property in such State as may be necessary to pay the same.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the word article in the sixth section of the act to which this is supplementary shall be construed to mean section.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is my purpose to move to concur in the Senate amendment with certain amendments which I am directed to offer by the Committee on the Judiciary. The first amendment is in section one, line twenty-two, after the word "States" to insert the following as a part of the oath prescribed:

That I have never been a member of any State Legislature, nor held any executive or judicial office in any State, and afterward engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof.

I will state the purpose of this amendment. It has been ascertained since the passage of this bill that certain executive and legislative officers in at least one of the rebel States have not been required to take the oath prescribed by the constitutional amendment to support the Constitution of the United States, as for instance in the State of Virginia, where the executive and judicial oath has been for years omitted. Therefore it is feared that while those persons were intended to be included within the provisions of the third section of the constitutional amendment submitted to the States by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, they would not in fact be so included. That section provides that—

"No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof."

Now, although all persons were intended to be included in that section who have held executive, judicial, or legislative offices in any State and afterward went into the rebellion, yet those who did not take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States would not, by the terms of this bill, be brought within the exclusion of the third section of the constitutional amendment. The provision of the bill, therefore, ought to be extended in its operation, so that those parties shall not be permitted to take advantage of their own wrong.

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to inquire if the gentleman is not assuming what does not belong to the qualification which is contained in the constitutional amendment when he says it was intended to include every legislative officer of those States. It occurs to me that our object was to exclude men who had once taken the oath to support the Constitution of the United States and then fought against that Constitution.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is my statement.

Mr. SPALDING. Now, you propose to take in any man who did not take the oath, but who, peradventure, ought to have taken it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. And who afterward engaged in rebellion.

Mr. SPALDING. Exactly; will that not include every official in those States?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is confined to the same class of officers, executive and judicial.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The State of Virginia in 1849, in anticipation of the rebellion, repealed all laws requiring the oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States of America, and from that time forth no such oath has been administered in the State; and I take it that this is to supply that deficiency.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Of course, and very properly.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, if it be in relation to this amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. It is in relation to the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If it is not in relation to the amendment I cannot yield. I ask the previous question on the amendment to the amendment of the Senate.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, resumed the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether, when these amendments proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary are disposed of, it will be in order to propose amendments to a preceding part of the bill?

The SPEAKER. When the amendments offered by the committee are disposed of it will then be in order to offer amendments to any part of the bill.

Mr. SPALDING. Will it be in order to move to concur in the amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question will then recur on concurring in the Senate amendment as amended.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The second amendment which I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to offer is upon page 10, in section five, lines three, four, and five, to strike out the words "cast at said election, [at least one-half of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification;]" so that it will read:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the electors qualified as herein specified, the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session, then immediately upon its next assembling, &c.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to know if a motion to concur in the Senate amendment is not a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. It is; but a motion to amend has priority.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish at the proper time to make a motion to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule on the subject on page 14 of the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A motion to amend an amendment from either House takes precedence of a motion to agree or disagree."

Mr. SPALDING. Then it will be in order for me to make that motion after the amendments are acted on; otherwise I would have no opportunity at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio can arrive at his object by inducing the House to vote down these amendments, and then the question will recur on agreeing to the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. SPALDING. I had been led to believe that the first question in order would be on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. It would be, but if any gentleman moves to amend the Senate amendment that motion has precedence.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The object of this amendment is to restore this provision of the bill to the same condition in which it went to the Senate.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] that he insert the word "registered" before the word "electors" in the third line, so that it shall provide that "the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the registered electors qualified," &c.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. CHANLER. I would ask the gentleman from Iowa if the effect of that amendment would not be to make the registration of the voters the test of the will of the people rather than their ballots?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My construction of the term "qualified electors" is that it includes the registered electors, those who are qualified to vote.

Mr. CHANLER. That is not the point I make. If I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] its effect is to make the majority of the registered voters the test of the will of the people.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I will state that my interpretation of the word qualified refers not to the matter of registration but to the right to be registered, and it has been so decided in contested-election cases here. A man is a qualified voter who has the right to be registered; and there was a decision made by the Thirty-Ninth Congress that a man who was not registered, but who was entitled to be registered, was a voter. I therefore state to my friend from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] that unless he will accept the amendment I have suggested, I will, if I have the opportunity, move to insert the word "registered" before the word "voters."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] although I do not think it will change the effect of the section. I will modify my amendment in that respect; and I now call the previous question on the amendment as modified.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. MARSHALL. As this is an important amendment I ask for the yeas and nays on its adoption.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 98, nays 29, not voting 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Garfield, Gravely, Hamilton, Hayes, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Mallory, Marvin, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Plants, Polsey, Pomeroy, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—98.

NAYS—Messrs. Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Holman, Humphrey, Kerr, Marshall, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Taber, Van Auken, Van Trump, and Wood—29.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Barnes, Bromwell, Sidney Clarke, Dawes, Denison, Eliot, Ferry, Finney, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Harding, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, McCarthy, Moorhead, Morrell, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Poland, Price, Raum, Ross, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, Trowbridge, William B. Washburn, John T. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—36.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I notice that in the first section of the amendment of the Senate, the act of the 2d of March, 1867, is described as "An act approved March 2." As it was not approved, but passed over the veto of the President, it should read "act passed," &c.

The SPEAKER. The word "approved" is an error of the printer; the engrossed bill contains the word "passed" and not "approved."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to amend the sixth section of the amendment of the Senate by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That if any person shall knowingly and falsely take and subscribe any oath in this act prescribed, such person so offending, and being thereof duly convicted, shall be subject to the pains, penalties, and disabilities which by law are provided for the punishment of the crime of willful and corrupt perjury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now move that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate as amended; and on that I call the previous question.

Mr. DONNELLY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I must decline to yield; I ask the sense of the House on the question.

The previous question was seconded upon a division—ayes 83, noes 11.

The main question was then ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of the Senate, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPTURED COIN AND BULLION.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to joint resolution of the House No. 10, in relation to certain coin and bullion on special deposit in the Treasury.

The amendment of the Senate was to insert after the word "States" in line four the words "after said bullion is converted by direction of the Treasurer into coin."

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN H. ELLIS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 25, for the relief of John H. Ellis, a paymaster in the United States Army; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. LOAN. I ask that this bill be put upon its passage at this time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read at length. It provides for the allowance to John H. Ellis, in the settlement of his accounts as paymaster, of $3,673 91, being the amount lost in consequence of the larceny of $19,093 91 of the public moneys from his custody at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, on the night of January 1, 1866, if the Paymaster General shall deem him justly entitled to this credit, and shall certify his approval of it.

Mr. WARD. I wish to ask the gentleman whether this claim was not submitted to the Committee of Claims of this House during the last Congress, and considered by that committee?

Mr. LOAN. It was not. It was considered by the Senate committee during the Thirty-Ninth as well as the present Congress, and has been favorably reported upon several times unanimously.

Mr. WARD. Has it been considered by any committee of this House during this or any former Congress?

Mr. LOAN. No, sir; it is a Senate bill.

Mr. WARD. Well, I suggest to the gentleman that he allow the bill to be referred to the Committee of Claims when appointed.

Mr. LOAN. When the House shall have heard the statement I propose to make I think members will be satisfied that the bill should be passed now.

This bill was referred to the appropriate Senate committee of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and was reported upon favorably by the unanimous vote of the committee. During the closing hours of the session it happened not to be called up in the Senate. At the present session the bill has been again referred to the Committee on Claims of that body. It has again received the unanimous sanction of that committee, and has been passed by the Senate without a division. The evidence in this case is record evidence; and it shows this to be a very meritorious and just claim. The accounts of this officer cannot be settled without the passage of a bill of this kind. I ask the Clerk to read the report of the Senate committee, which I think will exhibit the case satisfactorily to every member.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri why he is not willing that this bill shall take the usual course and be referred to a committee. Certainly the accounts need not be closed up before the next session of Congress.

Mr. LOAN. This case has undergone full examination during the Thirty-Ninth Congress. The statement of the accounting officers, which is embraced in the report, shows, I think, the entire justice of the claim. When the report shall have been read I think the gentleman will be fully satisfied. I call for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a bill for the relief of John H. Ellis, a paymaster in the United States Army, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report:

That while the said Ellis was engaged in the discharge of his duties as paymaster as aforesaid at Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, there were stolen from him funds belonging to the United States, amounting to the sum of $18,635 91, on the night of the 1st of January, 1866.

On the application of the said Ellis, a board of officers, consisting of Colonel J. V. D. Reeve, thirteenth United States infantry; Brevet Lieutenant Colonel G. W. Yates, of the thirteenth Missouri cavalry, and Lieutenant R. A. Torrey, thirteenth United States infantry, were detailed by Brevet Major General Elliott to examine and report upon the robbery aforesaid. The facts connected with said robbery are set forth in their report, as follows:

"The board find that a safe containing Government funds to the amount of some nineteen thousand dollars, as stated by Major Ellis, additional paymaster United States Army, was stolen from the office of Major Ellis within the limits of the post of Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, some time during the night of the 1st instant, (January, 1866.) The circumstances were these: the office, which is a room in a building used for such purposes, situated on the east side of the parade, was left, during the night in question, in charge of an orderly to Major Ellis, named W. L. Fulcher, a private in the thirteenth Missouri cavalry; said orderly, together with Major Bowson's orderly, Albert Godfrey, of one of the volunteer regiments United States, occupying a room directly in the rear of the office robbed. Mr. Kemper, clerk in the employ of Major Ellis, and who usually slept in the same room with the orderlies, on returning to the office on the morning of the 2d instant, found the hall doors, also the door of the office, locked; and going in, after opening the door with pass-key, found the safe gone, and informed Major Ellis of the fact without delay. Privates W. L. Fulcher and Albert Godfrey, the orderlies in question, were absent, and had left in their room a large part of their soldiers' clothing, and several things were found in the pockets of their pants, among which a large bunch of keys of various sizes, an awl with broken point, and some small pieces of iron, filed down as if to fit the wards of the lock of the safe. Two pairs of trousers, one coat, and one vest, (citizens'), the property of Mr. Kemper, were taken from this room. It seems to have been the practice of Major Ellis to permit no one to go to the safe for the purpose of getting money, doing all the handling of it himself; and had always kept it under his own eye, unless he had reason to suppose that his clerk was in his office. Major Ellis did not think a guard necessary for the protection of Government money when in safe, preferring to keep it in quarters where he lives, or in his office, with his clerk to keep watch.

On the night in question Major Ellis was in his office until about eight o'clock p. m., before which time the clerk came in, and it was supposed by Major Ellis that he (the clerk) intended to remain in the building during the night, as such was his custom. On the contrary, Mr. Kemper went out, remaining out all night, thus affording thieves an opportunity to do their work. It would seem that Major Ellis took all care that seemed necessary for the safe-keeping of the money in question, and that due vigilance had been used for its proper keeping."

In the affidavit of Kemper, the clerk, he states: "About eight o'clock p. m. of the 1st of January, 1866, affiant returned from Leavenworth city, where he had been during the day, and found Major Ellis in the office with the safe in which he kept the Government money. Shortly afterward he left for the night, leaving affiant in the room with the safe, the safe-keys being in possession of Major Ellis. The orderly in daily attendance, having performed his duties for the day, left the office. Being desirous of seeing a friend in the city, who was about leaving on a journey, affiant concluded to return to the city, and knowing the comparatively small amount of money in the safe, and considering it entirely safe and prudent to leave the promises without notifying Major Ellis of his intention to do so, he locked and securely fastened the door of the office; and not deeming it possible for any one to break into the room and carry the safe past the guard, whose duty it was to challenge every one passing after tattoo, he returned to the city."

The report and finding of said board were approved by General Elliott, and are, in the opinion of the committee, fully sustained by the evidence.

The robbers were pursued and overtaken, and turned out to be the aforesaid orderlies who were in attendance as aforesaid. They were brought back to camp, tried, convicted, and sentenced to ten years' service in the penitentiary. There were recovered from them the sum of $14,786 of the money stolen, and two saddles and two horses, out of the sale of which the sum of $176 was realized, leaving a deficit lost by the robbery of $3,673 91.

Major Ellis files with the papers before the committee a statement of F. E. Hunt, paymaster in charge of the district at the time of the robbery, certifying to the care, integrity, and faithful official conduct of Major Ellis, and that, in the opinion of said Hunt, the said Ellis "took due care of the public money in his possession at all times." And on this certificate of Paymaster Hunt the Paymaster General has made an indorsement, concluding as follows: "I concur in the belief, as stated by Colonel Hunt, that Major Ellis has been duly careful of the public money in his charge."

Concurring in the finding aforesaid of the board of officers aforesaid, and with the Paymaster General, that said Ellis was a careful custodian of the public money in his charge, and at the time of the robbery was guilty of no remissness of duty, or carelessness of conduct, that would, legally or morally, render him liable for the unrecovered money stolen, the committee recommend the passage of said bill.

Mr. LOAN. I desire to state that this matter has undergone the revision of Major Ellis's superior officer, who acquits him of all blame, believing that he is neither morally nor legally bound to reimburse the money. The bill merely proposes to refer the matter to Paymaster General Brice, that he may revise those accounts and ascertain whether Major Ellis is entitled to be allowed this amount of money, it having been lost without any fault on his part.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor to be a member of the Committee of Claims during the Thirty-Ninth Congress. A large number of claims of this character came before that committee, claims for bonds and moneys stolen, obligations of different sorts destroyed or lost in various ways. The claims of this character amounted in the aggregate to millions of dollars. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that we should not pass claims of this sort without submitting them to the consideration of some committee. I have great respect for the Senate Committee on Claims, and also great respect for the opinions and wishes of the gentleman from Missouri; but I believe that we should not thus early in the session establish the principle of permitting the passage through this House of a bill which will charge the Government with the payment of money (and such will be the effect of this bill if the Paymaster General should certify that in his opinion the claim is proper) without the examination of the claim by any committee. I trust the gentleman will allow me to enter a motion to refer this bill to the Committee of Claims when appointed.

Mr. LOAN. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WARD. I hope it will not be seconded.

Mr. LOAN. I withdraw it for a moment, and yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DRIGGS. When this bill was first read I was inclined to vote against it, but after hearing the report of the committee read, after the statement that this theft was committed by men in the United States service, in whose charge it was placed, that they were pursued, convicted, and imprisoned, I feel it is a bill that ought to be passed.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman from Missouri whether the amount of the deficit does not depend entirely upon the unsworn testimony of Major Ellis?

Mr. LOAN. It does not.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. There is nothing to show there is any sworn testimony as to the amount of money lost.

Mr. LOAN. Depositions are here. They were referred to the committee.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I think it is better to leave this subject to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WARD. If the previous question be voted down, will not my motion to refer be in order?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. LOAN demanded the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 52.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WARD. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Claims when appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BARR BAHYMER.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, moved that leave be granted to Barr Bahymer for the withdrawal of his papers from the files of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC EXPENDITURES.

The SPEAKER announced the following as the standing Committee on Public Expenditures: Calvin T. Hulburd, New York; John M. Broomall, Pennsylvania; Asabel W. Hubbard, Iowa; Tobias A. Plants, Ohio; Henry P. H. Bromwell, Illinois; John Coburn, Indiana; John A. Peters, Maine; Stephen Taber, New York; Thomas E. Noell, Missouri.

DONAHUE, RYAN, AND SECOR.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 17, for the relief of Donahue, Ryan & Secor; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SCOTFIELD moved that it be referred to the Committee of Claims when appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARKET SQUARE, BURLINGTON, IOWA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 22, in relation to a certain tract of land in Burlington, Iowa; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill provides that a certain ordinance adopted by the city council of Burlington, Iowa, on December 10, 1866, devoting Market square to certain public purposes, and providing for the location of certain railroad tracks upon certain streets, and for other purposes, is hereby ratified, approved, and made legal and valid, so far as it relates to said public square; and it further provides that said ordinance shall operate to convey to the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company the rights in the premises known as Market square on the terms and conditions and for the purposes therein designated, and shall have the same force, operation, and effect as if the fee simple title to said Market square and streets were owned by said city at the date of said ordinance.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ERIE AND ONTARIO SHIP-CANAL.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 26, providing for the necessary surveys for a ship-canal between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario for military, naval, and commercial purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of War to cause surveys, with plans and estimates of cost, to be made by an officer of engineers for a ship-canal to connect Lakes Erie and Ontario or the navigable waters thereof, of suitable location and dimensions for military, naval, and commercial purposes, and that the expenses of the same be defrayed from the sums appropriated in the acts of June 23, 1866, and March 2, 1867, for examinations and surveys relative to the improvement of harbors and rivers on the northwestern lakes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order, that this bill makes an appropriation.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. The appropriation has already been made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. A bill to be an appropriation bill must itself take money out of the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. It diverts appropriations for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This does not take money out of the Treasury, but refers to appropriations made in previous bills.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I ask to have the bill put on its passage, and demand the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was disagreed to—yeas 24, noes 59.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 24, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Burr, Butler, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Ferriss, Fox, Garfield, Gravelly, Hamilton, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Ketcham, Lufkin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, Marshall, McClurg, Miller, Moore, Mungen, Myers, Neill, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Plants, Pomeroy, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Twitcheell, Upton, Van Aersnam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—83.

NAYS—Messrs. Boyer, Broomall, Covode, Eggleston, Getz, Glossbrenner, Holman, Kerr, Kitchen, Koontz, Mercer, Morgan, Nicholson, Polsley, Randall, Robinson, Selye, Stigraeves, Taber, Van Auken, Van Trump, Ward, Thomas Williams, and Wood—24.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Barnes, Brooks, Buckland, Cake, Cullom, Dawes, Denison, Ela, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kelley, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrill, Morrissey, Newcomb, Niblack, Paine, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Poland, Price, Pruyn, Raum, Ross, Shellabarger, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Stone, Trowbridge, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, and Stephen F. Wilson—56.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A VESSEL.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of Senate bill No. 60, to change the name of the steamship Paonshun; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the owners of the steamship Paonshun to change the name of the same to Nevada.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I ask that this bill be put on its passage.

Mr. CHANLER. Is this reported by any committee?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. It is a Senate bill. This is a new steamship built for the China trade and afterward purchased for service on the Pacific, on the Northwest coast. The owners wish to call it Nevada instead of the outlandish Chinese name. No register has ever been issued as yet.

Mr. PAINE. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce when appointed. I know the chairman of that committee in the last Congress, who is now absent, [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois,] as well as the second member of that committee, [Mr. ELIOT,] who is also now absent, were opposed to allowing the change of name of any vessels during the Thirty-Ninth Congress. Hence I hardly think it proper to ask the consent of the House to have it done in this case. There may be some extenuating circumstance in this case, but I think it is a dangerous precedent.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman will allow me to state that this is a new vessel, that no register has ever been issued for it, but that the former owners had given notice that they intended to call it by the name of Paonshun.

Mr. PAINE. I cannot see how there can be any necessity for the passage of such a bill as this, even if what the gentleman states is true, and I am opposed to its passage.

Mr. O'NEILL. Perhaps I can explain this matter to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.] This ship was purchased before she was built, while on the stocks in the ship-yard in New York. The owners afterward desired to change her name from the Paonshun to the Nevada. The vessel had never left any port, the ship had never floated, and therefore the principle referred to as laid down by the Committee on Commerce does not apply in this case.

Mr. PAINE. If the facts stated be true, then the owners can give this vessel any name they please without any legislation here.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Oh, no; because they had given notice of the name. I demand the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The question was put; and there were—yeas 44, noes 43.

Mr. SPALDING demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PAINE and HOOPER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 42, noes 57.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'NEILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to offer a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must wait until the business on the Speaker's table has been disposed of.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to suspend the rules so as to dispense with proceeding further with the business on the Speaker's table.

The question was put; and there were—yeas 32, noes 65.

So (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and there were—yeas 50, noes 62.

So the House refused to adjourn.

LIVES OF PASSENGERS ON STEAMBOATS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was joint resolution of the Senate No. 30, amending the ninth section of an act to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved August 30, 1852; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I ask that that bill be put upon its passage now.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that it would be safer to refer that bill to the Committee on Commerce when appointed.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I will state to the gentleman that the Committee on Commerce of the last Congress reported this joint resolution at the last session, but it failed in the Senate. The Senate have now passed it. It carries out a very desirable object in providing for the carriage of matches.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I would inquire of my colleague if the object of this joint resolution is not to dispense with what is now required by law, the procurement of safes for the purpose of carrying matches on steamboats?

Mr. EGGLESTON. The object of this bill is to so change the law of 1852 that matches packed in compact boxes lined with zinc and securely fastened with screws may be carried upon steamboats, instead of requiring them to be carried in safes for the purpose. In 1852, when the act was originally passed, matches were packed in paper, and consequently it was necessary to have them carried in safes. But that precaution is not now necessary.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BEAMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAINE. As the rules now stand, this afternoon is the only time during this week when the rules can be suspended. We can proceed with the business on the Speaker's table to-morrow or any other day. I therefore move that the further execution of the order to consider business upon the Speaker's table be postponed for this day.

Mr. THOMAS. I have a proposition that I desire to bring before the House at some period of the session, and in order to do so I would like to move that at any time during the present session of Congress it shall be competent for the House to entertain a motion to suspend the rules; which of course would be done by a two-thirds vote. My object is to give the House the same power in that respect on any day of this session that it now has on Mondays after the expiration of the morning.

Mr. BLAINE. Very good, I think that is right.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

Mr. BLAINE. I now insist upon my motion to postpone for the present the further execution of the order to proceed with the consideration of business on the Speaker's table, and then the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] will be in order.

The motion of Mr. BLAINE was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. I now move that during the remainder of this session of Congress a motion to suspend the rules shall be in order at any time, the same as on Monday after the morning hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] in effect a proposition to change the rule, and as such must it not lie over for one day before it is considered?

The SPEAKER. On Monday, after the morning hour, two thirds of the members present can suspend or change any rule.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the two Houses should fix upon a day of adjournment, would not motions to suspend the rule then be in order at any time?

The SPEAKER. They would be in order at any time during the last ten days of the session. The Chair is of opinion that this session is now within ten days of its close.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then what need of adopting the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS?]

The SPEAKER. The time for adjournment has not been definitely determined upon, and consequently that rule cannot apply to the action of the House.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. THOMAS; and upon a division, there were—ayes 78, noes 25.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the motion was agreed to.

STATE GOVERNMENT OF MARYLAND.

Mr. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the testimony taken by the Judiciary Committee of the last House of Representatives, in pursuance of resolutions of that House, concerning to some extent affairs in Maryland, and now in the custody of the Clerk of this House, be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to complete the inquiries which the last committee was instructed to make; and to inquire whether the people of Maryland have a State government republican in form, and such as Congress can consistently, with the requirements of the Constitution of the United States, recognize and guaranty.

Mr. THOMAS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMPENSATION FOR SLAVES ENLISTED.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask consent of the House to introduce for consideration at this time a joint resolution suspending all proceedings in relation to payment for slaves drafted or received as volunteers in the military service of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read for information.

The joint resolution was read at length. It provides that all further proceedings under section twenty-four of the act of Congress approved July 24, 1864, to award compensation to the masters of slaves drafted into the military service of the United States, and to award compensation to persons to whom colored volunteers may owe service, and under the second section of the act approved July 28, 1866, making appropriations for payment to persons claiming service or labor from colored volunteers or drafted men, be, and the same are hereby, suspended; and the Secretary of War is directed to dissolve all commissions appointed under the said sections, and to make payments to the commissioners and clerks for the service rendered by them upon their making report of their proceedings to the War Department.

Mr. NICHOLSON and Mr. BROOKS objected.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended in order that I may introduce this joint resolution for action at this time.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKS. I would ask the gentleman if, in the absence of any representation from the States of Tennessee and Kentucky upon the floor of this House at this time, he thinks it would be quite right to press his proposition now?

Mr. SCHENCK. I make this motion at the earnest solicitation of some of the best people in Tennessee.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Was not a similar bill passed at the last session?

Mr. SCHENCK. In January of this year a bill was passed suspending the payment of any of these claims, requiring that a report should be made, through the Secretary of War, to Congress before any payment of money should be made. That bill became a law; but that act did not suspend the action of the commissioners. This commission is now in full blast, the commissioners receiving eight dollars per day, and running up large expenses by the employment of clerks, &c. These commissioners, by their awards, are rolling up a large amount of these claims, to be used hereafter as a corruption fund to trade upon or for other purposes. This bill proposes to suspend all proceedings—

Mr. NICHOLSON. I rise to a point of order. I submit that a motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

On the motion to suspend the rules,

Mr. BROOKS called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 92, nays 24, not voting 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Brownell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eekley, Eila, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Gravely, Hamilton, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kitchen, Koontz, Laflin, William Lawrence, Logan, Marvin, McClurg, Miller, Moore, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pile, Plants, Poland, Polster, Pomeroy, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spaulding, Taylor, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernam, Bart Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Windom—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Holman, Kerr, Marshall, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Sitgreaves, Taber, Van Auker, Van Trump, and Wood—24.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Banks, Barnes, Calk, Chanler, Coburn, Dyes, Denison, Eggleston, Eliot, Finney, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Harding, Hill, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Kelsey, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Longbridge, Lynch, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrell, Phelps, Pike, Price, Baum, Selye, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, Trowbridge, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—47.

So (two thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

During the roll-call,

Mr. GARFIELD said: I desire to announce that the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. ALLISON, is detained from the House by sickness.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The joint resolution was introduced and read a first and second time.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to enter into any debate on this subject. I think the proposition explains itself, and will commend itself to the judgment of the House. I simply repeat the statement that we have not, by any legislation heretofore adopted, suspended the proceedings of these commissioners, but have only provided that their reports shall be transmitted through the Secretary of War to Congress, and that no payments shall be made until further action by Congress. The object of this joint resolution is to dissolve the commission for the present, thus putting a stop to all proceedings until Congress shall otherwise direct.

Mr. COOK. With the consent of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] I wish to say that a bill similar to this was passed in the House at the last session, but failed in the Senate; so that the House has once already expressed its opinion on this question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I believe the gentleman is correct. The House has already passed a bill or joint resolution in substance the same as this; but it did not receive the concurrence of the Senate.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DUTY ON UMBRELLAS AND FURNITURE SPRINGS.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution fixing the rate of duty on umbrellas and on wire spiral furniture springs; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution provides that from and after its passage there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon umbrellas, parasols, and sunshades imported from foreign countries, when made of silk, no lower rate of duty than that now imposed upon piece and dress silks, namely, sixty per cent. ad valorem; and when made of other materials than silk, the duty is to be fifty per cent. ad valorem. The joint resolution further provides that wire spiral furniture springs imported from foreign countries, manufactured of iron wire, shall be required to pay the same rate of duty now imposed on iron wire, namely two cents per pound and fifty per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. KELLEY demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASYLUM FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. BUTLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over certain property of the United States at Camp Chase, Ohio, for the use of the National Asylum for disabled volunteer soldiers, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution authorizes the Secretary of War to turn over the barracks, buildings, and other property of the United States now at Camp Chase, near Columbus, Ohio, to the board of managers of the National Asylum for disabled volunteer soldiers, for the use and benefit of said soldiers.

It also authorizes the Secretary of War to sell such surplus clothing and quartermaster and medical stores as he may deem expedient at first prices to the National Asylum for the use of the disabled soldiers therein.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUTLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EMPLOYÉS IN CURRENCY BUREAU.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to extend to the employés in the first division of the National Currency Bureau of the Treasury Department the provisions of the joint resolution approved the 28th of February, 1867, giving additional compensation to certain employés in the civil service at Washington.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to state that according to the understanding, I believe, of every member of this House, the joint resolution passed near the close of the last Congress did embrace these employés, but by a singular construction of the First Comptroller they are shut out. They are employés who work more hours and get less pay than any other employés in the Treasury Department. There is no earthly doubt in my mind that the law does embrace these people, but they are shut out by this construction of the First Comptroller.

Mr. SCHENCK. I presented this morning the memorial of the watchmen and other employes in the quartermaster's department, who are also shut out by the construction of the Comptroller. It was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask the gentleman to modify his resolution so as to include them.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman had better provide for them in a separate resolution. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MONEYS COVERED INTO THE TREASURY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution directing certain moneys now in the hands of the United States Treasurer, as special agent of the Treasury Department, be covered by warrant into the United States Treasury; which was read a first and second time.

The preamble states that there is now in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States, as special agent of the Treasury Department, several million dollars, the proceeds of property captured during the rebellion, which money is under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, and as it now stands may be disposed of in settling claims preferred by the alleged former owners of said captured property without the sanction of Congress, and that it is but proper such claims should not be settled and paid without first receiving the approval of Congress; and the resolution then directs that all moneys thus held by the Treasurer of the United States shall be at once covered by warrants into the United States Treasury by authority of law.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

STRAW WRAPPING-PAPER, ETC.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to make a brief explanation preparatory to submitting a motion to suspend the rules. During the consideration of the internal revenue bill in the House there was an amendment adopted to put "straw wrapping-paper" on the free list. It was intended afterward to add wrapping-paper made from "wood," but the opportunity did not occur in the House, and it was suggested that the matter could be properly adjusted in the Senate. But in that branch also it was neglected, and the assurance was given that it should be rectified in the conference committee, by retaining the tax on straw paper or removing it from the paper made of wood. Either arrangement would be fair; but to exempt the one and tax the other is certainly to make an injurious discrimination. But in the conference committee, by some oversight or mistake, the matter was neglected. And on Saturday last, finding on an examination of the amended internal revenue act that "straw" paper was placed on the free list, while paper made from "wood" is still left subject to a tax of five per cent., I addressed a line to the late chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, now an honored Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] for an explanation of the matter. To my inquiry Mr. MORRILL made the following reply:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 16, 1867.

MY DEAR SIR: Your favor of this day is at hand. I did certainly suppose that "straw wrapping-paper" was stricken from the exempt list in the tax bill in the committee of conference. It is very plain that if wrapping-paper made of straw is exempt, then that made of "wood" should also be exempt. Being used for the same purposes they should be placed on an equality, or if any discrimination is made, it ought not to be against an enterprise in its infancy, and as yet of small magnitude.

Very truly yours,
JUSTIN S. MORRILL.

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE.

Now, I have drawn up a bill to meet this difficulty, which I think no gentleman can object to. It affects the revenue to a very inconsiderable amount. The object simply is to exempt wrapping-paper made of wood, the same as paper made of straw is now exempt from tax. The title of it is, "A bill to exempt wrapping-paper made of wood from internal tax."

The bill was read a first and second time. It provides for the exemption from internal tax, from and after the passage of this act, of wrapping-paper made of wood.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Maine to allow an amendment by inserting the word "corn-stalks."

Mr. BLAINE. I am perfectly willing to accept that, because they all ought to be on the same footing.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is a very important manufacture.

No objection being made, the amendment of Mr. GARFIELD was agreed to.

Mr. JUDD. I ask the gentleman from Maine to include the manufacture of ladders.

Mr. BLAINE. That is raising another question, and I cannot accept it. This is not original legislation, but simply by way of correction. The late chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who is a man of great accuracy, admits that this was a mistake. I call the previous question.

Mr. JUDD. I desire to say a single word. I think the gentleman will have no objection to my proposition when he hears my statement. I am advised that every manufacture from wood was put on the free list under the last internal revenue law except the article I named. One of my constituents has addressed me a complaint on this subject during this session of Congress.

Mr. BLAINE. I will cheerfully vote for a bill to meet that object if the gentleman will introduce it on its own merits. It is hardly cognate matter in the connection in which it is offered.

Mr. JUDD. As I understood the letter of the gentleman from Vermont, it is an argument for putting wrapping-paper made of wood on the same basis as similar paper made of straw, and understanding it thus I think while we are equalizing these things we should place all sorts of manufactures from wood upon the same basis and allow this poor ladder business to come in upon the free list.

Mr. BLAINE. I cannot think it appropriate in this bill.

The SPEAKER. Even if the gentleman from Maine should allow the amendment, it would not be germane to this bill. Its title is in relation to wrapping-paper.

The title was amended by adding the word "corn-stalks."

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

Mr. PERHAM. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to authorize the Washington Temperance Society to issue certificates of stock without revenue stamps.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will consider that motion as an objection to the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:
By Mr. GLOSSBRENNER: The petition of John

By Mr. PIKE: The memorial of the river improvement convention, held in St. Louis, Missouri, February 13, 1867.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The memorial of employes of the Quartermaster General's office, praying for such legislation as will entitle them to the twenty per cent. extra compensation allowed by law to other Government employes.

By Mr. VAN WYCK: The petition of Samuel Strong, praying for relief.

Also, the petition of Michael Maher, praying that the pension certificate issued to him be dated January 31, 1864, instead of March 4, 1865.

By Mr. WINDOM: The memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, for the establishment of a mail route from Rochester, in Olmstead county, to Leroy, in Mower county, by way of Pleasant Grove, Hamilton, and Spring Valley.

IN SENATE.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the resolution of the Senate instructing the joint Committee on Retrenchment to examine into the method adopted by the Treasury Department to print bonds, notes, and securities of the United States, and what guards have been adopted to prevent frauds and mistakes.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph A. Van Brunt, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 36) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the bark Aug. Gaurdien; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 24) relative to the payment of expenses incurred by the judges of election for the cities of Washington and Georgetown, District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 80) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the Government warehouses on Atlantic dock, Brooklyn, New York, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 41) authorizing the payment of the rewards offered by the President of the United States and the officers of the War Department in April and May, 1865, for the capture of Jefferson Davis, reported it without amendment.

ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment; and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed of the Report of the National Academy of Sciences for 1866, in addition to the usual number, one thousand extra copies for the use of the Academy.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 72) to exempt wrapping-paper made from wood or corn-stalks from internal tax—to the Committee on Finance.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 15) suspending all proceedings in relation to payment for slaves drafted or received as volunteers in the military service of the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 16) fixing the rate of duty on umbrellas and on wire spiral furniture springs—to the Committee on Finance.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 19) directing that certain moneys now in the hands of the United States Treasurer, as special agent of the Treasury Department, be covered by warrant into the United States Treasury—to the Committee on Finance.

DONATION OF PROPERTY AT CAMP CHASE.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 17) authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over certain property of the United States at Camp Chase, Ohio, for the use of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. That resolution was fully considered by the Military Committee at the last session, and passed in the form in which it is now before us, and it is scarcely worth while to refer to it. It simply gives to an asylum for disabled soldiers certain old property at Camp Chase. It has received the assent of the committees and of both Houses, and simply failed on an amendment between the two Houses at the last session. I hope it will be passed now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes the Secretary of War to turn over the barracks, buildings, and other property of the United States now at Camp Chase, near Columbus, Ohio, to the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, for the use and benefit of those soldiers. It also authorizes the Secretary of War to sell such surplus clothing and quartermaster's and medical stores as he may deem expedient, at first prices, to the National Asylum for the relief of disabled volunteer soldiers therein.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTRA COMPENSATION TO CIVIL EMPLOYÉS.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) to extend to the employés in the first division of the National Currency Bureau of the Treasury Department, the provisions of the joint resolution, approved February 23, 1867, giving additional compensation to certain employés in the civil service at Washington, was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I send to the Chair a communication that I desire to have read before that resolution is referred, and which I desire to accompany it.

The Secretary read the following communication:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.
COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE, March 10, 1867.

SIR: In the Chronicle of yesterday morning a communication appeared stating that the Comptroller had decided that the ladies employed in Mr. Clark's Note Bureau were not entitled to the twenty per cent. allowed by the joint resolution of February 28, and containing what the editor of the Chronicle denominated "caustic" remarks. And on yesterday Mr. FARNSWORTH introduced and had passed through the House another joint resolution apparently to correct a supposed erroneous decision of the Comptroller.

The Comptroller never made any such decision as that stated in the communication. On the contrary, more than ten days since I informed Mr. Clark that the females employed by him in his bureau were entitled to the twenty per cent.; and this is the only decision made by the Comptroller upon that point. I stated the same thing to Mr. FESSENDEN the same day or the day before.

I did make a decision that excluded most of the male employés in Mr. Clark's bureau for two reasons: First, if their compensation was insufficient it was fully within the power of Mr. Clark or the Secretary to increase it at pleasure, there being no limitation, as in the cases of officers, clerks, messengers, watchmen, &c. Second, if they worked over time they were paid for it, which was not the case with the other persons above named. During the month of February they were thus paid, and in one instance, to which my attention was called, a person employed at seven dollars per day was paid during February forty days, amounting to $280. If twenty per cent. be added, his compensation for that month would be $336. All the male employés excluded in the Note Bureau (and none others were excluded) were and are paid upon the same principle.

Some exception has also been taken to the decisions in relation to some of the employés of the quartermasters' and perhaps of some other offices. In relation to these employés, I remark that they were not within the terms of the proper Department to increase their pay if that now allowed is not enough, and in such cases a resolution of Congress is not needed.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
R. W. TAYLOR.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, Chairman Senate Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the joint resolution, together with that communication, be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEEDS.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 38) further to provide for the acknowledgment of deeds in the District of Columbia, to report it with an amendment in the form of a proviso; and I ask that the bill be put upon its passage at this time, if there be no objection to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is it about?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, which provides that hereafter acknowledgments of deeds or the conveyance of real estate in the District of Columbia may be taken by the recorder of deeds for the District or by a single justice of the peace, and it declares any such acknowledgment heretofore taken by a single justice of the peace to be a valid acknowledgment.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I will state that the bill has been considered by the judges of the district court, and they thought it to be desirable that it should pass.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia was to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held to impair the title of bona fide purchasers who, by conveyances and formal acknowledgments have, prior to the passage of this act, acquired paramount titles under existing laws.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to hear the whole of that bill read.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is a very important matter, passing laws to make valid deeds that were not valid before; or making a certain class of acknowledgments evidence of the validity of deeds which were not so before. I will inquire what committee reported this bill?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. It is reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and that amendment was drawn by the judges of the supreme court of the District.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The fact of its being drawn by them I do not think should insure its passage here. I recollect that a year or two ago a bill was passed, very inconsiderately as I think, affecting titles here, and this is likely to give rise to some trouble in regard to the acknowledgment of deeds.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator will allow me to ask him whether it affects anything more than the matter of evidence?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not prepared to say what the effect of it may be. If the Senators from New Hampshire and Maine have examined this matter with the existing laws and have seen that the effect of it is proper, I do not know that I shall feel called upon to object to it. I think it is a bill that ought to have been considered in the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have not examined it at all; but as I heard it read it occurred to me it was simply touching the matter of evidence, and not touching the validity of the instrument at all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. So I understand; but the matter of evidence will affect the title. Here is a conveyance recorded forty years ago, acknowledged before a single justice of the peace. Now the record, I presume, in this District is evidence. If you have the original deed, you might prove it, and the acknowledgement perhaps be of no importance; but suppose you have not the original deed and the conveyance was put upon the records here years ago, acknowledged before a single justice of the peace; that would be no evidence. Now, you pass a bill which declares that that shall be evidence.

What the effect of that would be upon other titles I am not exactly prepared to say, and do not wish to discuss at this moment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In such a case as supposed by the Senator undoubtedly the parties would be driven to other evidence; but I can hardly conceive of a case where justice would fail for the want of a resort to evidence. I suggest that it is to meet exactly such difficulties that this bill is found to be a necessity, and as I caught the substance of the bill in its reading I believe all existing rights are saved. As the Senator is reading the bill he will see whether all existing rights are saved. Then the query is, whether this amounts to anything more than to supply a defect in the method of obtaining evidence without prejudice to the rights of parties. If it is that, and only that, I can see no difficulty in it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I can conceive that very great difficulties may grow out of this. It may change the burden of proof. The proviso declares—

That nothing in this act shall be held to impair the title of bona fide purchasers who, by conveyances and formal acknowledgments have, prior to the passage of this act, acquired paramount titles under existing laws.

That would put the burden of proof on the parties who claimed lands, and may have been in possession of them for years, of proving the bona fides of the transaction, and their acknowledgments must be formal. This makes one class of informal acknowledgments perfect, but declares that other acknowledgments of deeds conveying title to parties adverse to these must be formal.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. The law as it now stands requires that an acknowledgment must be taken by two justices of the peace.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it is very proper to correct that. I see no possible objection to this bill, so far as authorizing the recorder and justices of the supreme court to take acknowledgment of deeds. The only difficulty about it is what its effect may be in making valid past transactions.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. There are two cases where acknowledgments were made before a single justice, and we want to cover those cases.

Mr. HARLAN. In this District the law now requires that an acknowledgment of deeds shall be taken before two justices of the peace. In nearly all the States of the Union one justice of the peace is competent to act under the local laws. The object of this bill is to correct what seemed to be an unnecessary formality. It also provides that the recorder of deeds may take acknowledgments; which is the case in nearly all the States of the Union. The committee intended merely to correct this useless formality in taking the acknowledgment of deeds. It is not supposed by the Committee on the District of Columbia that it would affect the validity of deeds. It is merely the confession on the part of the individual signing the deed that he has signed it, and nothing more. If, however, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary thinks it of sufficient importance to have it referred to another committee, perhaps it ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary; and I have no objection to its going there. I hope it may go there if the chairman has any doubt about the propriety of it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no sort of objection to this bill so far as it devolves this duty upon one justice of the peace and the recorder. I think that very proper. The only difficulty I had about it was, whether curing these defective acknowledgments heretofore made might not, perhaps without any intention on the part of the committee, interfere with existing titles. It is always dangerous to correct by a legislative act past transactions, because men have made their bargains and dealt upon the law as it stood.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I will simply say that the law now requires that the acknowledgment shall be made before two justices, and there are two instances where it was made before a single justice, and it was to make those two cases valid that this bill was introduced.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PAYMENT FOR SLAVES ENTERING THE ARMY.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A few moments ago a joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary suspending all proceedings in relation to payment for slaves drafted or received as volunteers into the military service of the United States. A bill of this same purport was before the Committee on the Judiciary at the last session of the last Congress, and reported upon favorably. It was a House resolution, and as this is the same matter over again I see no object in referring it again to the committee; and I ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the Senate proceed to act upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution indicated by him, and that the Senate proceed to its consideration. It requires unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 15) suspending all proceedings in relation to payment for slaves drafted or received as volunteers into the military service of the United States. It proposes to suspend all further proceedings under the twenty-fourth section of the act of Congress approved February 24, 1864, to award compensation to the masters of slaves drafted into the military service of the United States, and to award compensation to persons to whom colored volunteers may owe service, and under the second section of the act approved July 28, 1866, making appropriations for payment to persons claiming service or labor from colored volunteers or drafted men; and it directs the Secretary of War to dissolve the commissions appointed under those sections, and to make payment to the commissioners and clerks for the services rendered by them upon their making report of their proceedings to the War Department.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary will either postpone the consideration of that resolution until the next session or will assign to-morrow or some special day for its consideration. I object to its consideration at this time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose it is rather too late to object to its consideration now as an objection, because I had already called the attention of the Senate to it, and had the committee discharged, and it has been brought before the Senate by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate have already agreed to consider it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. And it has been read at length. I will state to the Senator from Kentucky that this is a joint resolution of the same purport as the one we had before us at the last session of Congress, and which I repeatedly sought to get the action of the Senate upon. It passed the House at the former session, and has now passed the House again, and I think it quite important that we should have action upon it. I should not resist its being acted upon to-morrow instead of to-day if there is any special reason for it; but it is an old matter that has been before us frequently; and while I should not object to its going over until to-morrow, if it can then be disposed of, if the Senator from Kentucky desires it to be considered to-morrow rather than to-day, and has any particular reason for it, I hope it will certainly be disposed of to-morrow if it does go over. I shall not, of course, resist any personal reason he may have for its going over, if it is not with a view to delay it.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senate will recollect that this bounty has been solemnly pledged by an act of Congress to the owners of slaves enlisted into the service. This proposition, therefore, involves the plighted faith and the contract of the Congress of the United States in the form of a law. At the last Congress the House attached a clause to one of the appropriation bills repealing the act of Congress that promised this bounty to the owners of slaves; and in that form that amendment to one of the appropriation bills was reported to the Senate. The Senate then considered the question whether they would repudiate this debt or not, and the Senate struck from the appropriation bill the clause that was attached to it by the House, so that the subject now has the plighted faith of the Senate in three different forms. By the act of 1864 this bounty of $300 to the owners of the slaves who enlisted into the Army was deliberately and solemnly pledged by the Congress of the United States. The House introduced upon an appropriation bill a clause repudiating that debt and proposing to violate the solemn faith of the Congress and Government of the United States. The Senate took into consideration the amendment of the House to one of the appropriation bills repudiating the contract, and they expunged that repudiation from the appropriation bill. At the last Congress, after the Senate had reiterated its plighted faith and reaffirmed its contract with the owners of slaves, by which the Government bound itself to pay this bounty to them, it deliberately and formally appropriated the money for the payment of these bounties. It is to repudiate this thrice affirmed solemn and deliberate contract of the Government of the United States that this resolution has been introduced again.

Now, Mr. President, if the Senate are determined to repudiate their contract, to violate the plighted faith of the Government, and in this way to bring repudiation and dishonor upon the contracts of the United States Government, I cannot prevent it; but I want the Senator to have this subject fixed for a particular day, when I wish to enter my solemn remonstrance with the Senate against this violation of its often repeated plighted faith.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator has now made his solemn protest. I do not know that it could be much more solemn than he has made it on the present occasion. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. I can make it a little more lengthy, if not more solemn. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. It certainly struck me, and I doubt not the whole Senate, with great solemnity when he delivered it; and I think now under the solemn influence that pervades the Senate we had better go on with the bill. I do not see any object in postponing it.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to put my armor in a little better order. I know the prowess of the honorable Senator from Illinois, and I know how heady he is when he gets upon the wrong track, and I want to endeavor to arrest him if I can. I therefore hope the matter will not be considered at the present time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we may go on with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no motion made to postpone, and the resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to its consideration at this time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is too late to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has voted to proceed to the consideration of the resolution, and therefore an objection now does not affect it.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I ask the Senator from Illinois to fix to-morrow for its consideration; and if he will have it considered let it come up then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any motion to postpone? The Chair hears none.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not wish to be discourteous to my friend from Kentucky. I understand that the postponement is not for delay.

Mr. DAVIS. Not at all for delay.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will interpose no objection then, and it will come up tomorrow, I shall not oppose to its going over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over by common consent.

INDIANA MILITARY CLAIMS.

Mr. MORTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 32) refunding to the State of Indiana expenses incurred for quartermaster and commissary stores and for transportation furnished to militia of said State while engaged in repelling rebel raids during the late rebellion, to report it back, with a recommendation that it pass; and if there be no objection I should like to have the joint resolution considered at the present time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear it read first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution. It provides that the expenses incurred by the State of Indiana for quartermaster and commissary stores and transportation furnished by the State to the Indiana militia during the late rebellion while engaged in repelling rebel raids, guarding against raids and insurrections, or while in any way engaged in the military service of the United States during the rebellion, shall be duly and properly examined by the proper departments or bureaus, under the direction of the Secretary of War, who shall cause to be paid and reimbursed to the State all such expenses as shall be found to have been necessarily and properly incurred, and an appropriation is made for that purpose out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the present consideration of this joint resolution. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is pressed to a vote I shall move to insert the word "Ohio" after the word "Indiana." It is to pay the expenses of the Morgan and other raids, and as a matter of course Ohio ought to be included as well as Indiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to amend the joint resolution by inserting the word "Ohio."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear some explanation of these bills that are brought in here for particular States. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will tell us what the necessity is for this, and why it is here.

Mr. WILSON. This is a claim on the part of the State of Indiana for stores furnished troops at the time of the Morgan raid and other times when raids were threatened and troops were called out for the defense of the people of that State. I understand that this amount of money was paid by the government of the State of Indiana, and that the State now asks the Federal Government to audit and settle the accounts. This resolution authorizes the Secretary of War to make this examination and settle the accounts according to the rules and regulations of the War Department. The resolution was introduced by the Senator from Indiana, who is a member of the committee, who was Governor of the State at that time, and who can, I have no doubt, answer on any points required. I leave the matter in his hands.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. After the word "Ohio" I move to insert "Tennessee."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not now in order.

Mr. MORTON. By this resolution I am not asking that the Government of the United States shall accept the accounts of the State of Indiana absolutely. It provides that the Secretary of War shall audit and pay such accounts for "such expenses as shall be found to have been necessarily and properly incurred." These expenses were incurred in subsisting and transporting the militia of Indiana while engaged in military service growing out of the late rebellion. So far as the pay of the troops is concerned that has already been allowed by the Government of the United States. The most of the accounts for the service of the men have been already audited and paid. Other accounts have been audited and not yet paid for want of an appropriation. Now, sir, I am asking that the expenses incurred by the State in subsisting and transporting these men at the very same time shall be allowed. If it is proper for the Government of the United States to pay for the services of the men, it is equally proper for the Government to pay for quartermaster and commissary stores and transportation. There is no question in my mind in regard to the propriety of this resolution. The accounts have been properly kept; but I am not asking the War Department to accept our accounts absolutely. I have provided in the resolution that the War Department shall pass upon the propriety and necessity of incurring these expenses, to avoid any objection that might be made on that account. I will state that I am advised that Congress has from time to time made appropriations of a similar character, especially for the State of Pennsylvania; and I can perceive myself no objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator if he can give any estimate as to the amount that this resolution will probably appropriate?

Mr. MORTON. A letter I have just received from home estimates the amount of expenditure of the State in this respect at about three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the resolution had better go over until tomorrow. I want to look at it. It is drawn in such very broad and general terms that it may cover anything and everything. It is not drawn with that care or guarded as these resolutions ordinarily are. I wish to look at it and see how that can be done.

Mr. RAMSEY. If this resolution is to go over, I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 28.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This subject is not yet disposed of. Does the Senator from Indiana consent to the postponement?

Mr. MORTON. I am unwilling to have it go over for the reason that the Senate is probably drawing to its adjournment, and it is necessary to pass it at once in order that it may be acted upon by the House of Representatives. I am anxious to have the matter settled at this session. For that reason I desire to press the resolution to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot consent that a resolution so very broad in its terms as this is shall be acted upon without an opportunity to examine it properly, and therefore I must interpose an objection to it. It is broader than any resolution I ever knew to be passed here, and exceeds the usual breadth and length and everything else that usually attends resolutions of this sort coming from the Committee on Military Affairs, though they are exceedingly liberal and generous.

Mr. MORTON. I think the objection taken by the Senator from Maine is not well founded. The resolution is definite in its terms. It states the character of the expenses incurred, and the occasion on which those expenses were incurred; and then, for the purpose of meeting the very objection that the Senator makes, that resolution provides that the War Department shall be made the judge of the necessity and propriety of incurring those expenses.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state to the Senator that I do not want to interpose any sort of obstacle in the way of everything being done that should be done; but we have never been in the habit here, that I know of, of passing, knowingly, resolutions appropriating money on the ground of what might be considered by a Secretary necessary and proper. We judge of what is necessary and proper here, and lay down certain rules for ascertaining the amount that may be due, and, ordinarily, fix the amount. It ought to be examined by a committee to see what the nature of the claims is, and a limit fixed. That is the ordinary course. Now, this is broader still; most extraordinary in its terms:

Guarding against raids and insurrections, or while in any way engaged in the military service of the United States during said rebellion.

That includes everything. It is a general sweep. And then the resolution leaves it to the War Department to decide what is necessary and proper. I will state to the Senator in all frankness that we never pass resolutions of that character here. We generally lay down the principles upon which the allowance shall be made, and know something about the claims in the first place, and fix a maximum. I remember several cases. There was one in which the State of Minnesota was very much interested, for guarding against Indian hostilities, a case that was quite as pressing as this one; and in that case we insisted that the claim should be audited in a particular way, in the first place, and then fixed a maximum beyond which they should not go before we would allow it to pass.

Now, as general as this is, it certainly would be beyond all precedent that I know anything about, in auditing these claims. Whatever expense has been properly incurred by the State of Indiana in defending itself against the enemy should be paid; but there cannot be occasion for any such great hurry about it. All the States are waiting, more or less, for the settlement of their war expenses, and there certainly should be an opportunity for proper examination, and a proper limitation should be fixed.

Mr. MORTON. I beg leave to say that in my judgment this resolution lays down as definite principles as can be laid down in determining the character of these claims. These troops were employed in repelling rebel raids and guarding against them, and in the service of the United States in other ways. If they were in the service of the United States at all during the rebellion—and that is a question of fact—the State is entitled to compensation for what she has disbursed. How much more definite can it be made unless the Senate itself will examine these accounts? The Senate will never do that. It has never done it in any similar case, and if that condition is to be attached the State might as well abandon her claims.

For the purpose of guarding against the objection that some of these expenses were not perhaps necessarily incurred, I have put in a provision that the War Department shall be the judge upon that subject; and certainly that is subjecting the State to enough scrutiny. I think that where a State like Indiana that has been invaded and been subjected to invasion, has incurred expenses in defending against them, the accounts made up by the State government ought to be accepted by the Government of the United States, and they ought to be received as having been honorably and honestly made. But, sir, I do not ask that. We are willing that the War Department shall pass upon these claims, one by one, and determine upon their propriety. Unless the Senate will examine them by its own committee, what can be provided more definite?

If this is laid over now it goes over to the next session. I want the appropriation made for the purpose of enabling the examination to go forward. It will be sometime before the State gets the money anyhow. The investigation must first be made. If the matter be put off now it is equivalent to a postponement of a year. It seems to me there ought to be no objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This resolution has not even been reported by a committee. It does not appear on its face to have been reported by the authority of any committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been reported this morning from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand from the chairman of the committee that it is not reported from that committee, and it does not appear to be so on its face.

Mr. MORTON. How is that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that this resolution is not reported by the committee.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to hear the chairman's statement on that point.

Mr. WILSON. I will relate the fact precisely as it stands. This joint resolution was introduced by the Senator from Indiana and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. At the time the matter came before the committee there were but three members present. The Senator was anxious to report it, and I said to him that he might report it to the Senate. A majority of the committee was not present, and the report was made by common assent of those present without an examination by a quorum of the committee.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he did not himself instruct me to report the resolution back?

Mr. WILSON. There was not a quorum of the committee present, and it was simply the understanding of those present that it might be submitted to the Senate, each member of the committee to be left at liberty to take his own course with regard to it. I thought from what the Senator said that he was exceedingly anxious to get the matter before the Senate at this session; but there was not a majority of the committee present to consider it, and of course the committee as an organization should not be held responsible for it. The Senator reported the joint resolution with my assent in order to bring it before the Senate and give him an opportunity to explain it.

Mr. MORTON. There was the same number present when this instruction was given to me by the chairman of the committee that were present when many other matters were passed upon that have been or will be reported to the Senate. If it was not proper for the number of the committee who were then present to direct the resolution to be reported back, the chairman of the committee understands it much better than I do. I reported it back according to his instructions, and supposed that in doing so I was doing what was right.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This shows the very great danger of acting upon bills in this way. They come in here at a little session, when Congress is kept together for a special purpose, and Senators desiring to get matters through procure them to be reported without an examination according to our rules of proceeding. It is a very incorrect, very loose, and very dangerous mode of proceeding, and I must enter my objection against it.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to have this matter understood. If this resolution is not considered as having been reported by the committee let it be referred back, and I shall know how to be governed hereafter in my action on such subjects. I presume there were as many persons present in committee when this matter was considered by it as there were present when many other things are agreed to be reported. I will not say that the objection is a capricious one, but I simply want to have it understood what the rule is, so that I may be governed by it hereafter.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will say to the honorable Senator that the invariable rule is to require a majority of a committee.

Mr. WILSON. All important bills referred to the Military Committee are taken up and examined carefully when a majority is present. We had a majority of the committee early the morning when this was taken up; and we passed on some nominations, although the nominations were mostly those to which nobody made any objection. This matter was brought up just before the close of the meeting of the committee, when there was only one member present, beside the Senator and myself. The other member of the committee, who had been in, making a quorum, was then out. The Senator expressed his anxiety to have the matter come before the Senate at this session, and I stated to him that he might report the joint resolution to the Senate, supposing that there could be no misunderstanding about it on his part or on mine, but that it would be understood that the committee as an organization had not examined it and could not be held responsible for it. That has been done once or twice; members of committees report a bill without committing the committee to it. It has been done by other committees of this body.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It has never been done by any committee of which I have been a member.

Mr. RAMSEY. If this matter goes over, I desire to move that the consideration of Senate bill No. 28 be resumed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter before the Senate must be disposed of. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The bill is not before the Senate. I requested that it be read in order that I might understand what it was, to see whether I would object to it or not, and I have been constantly stating my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair put the question to the Senate, whether they would proceed to its consideration, and no objection being made the Chair regarded the bill as before the Senate, and an amendment to it was offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the honorable Senator from Indiana if he will not consent to let this joint resolution lie over until to-morrow morning, so that it may be compared with precedents in other cases, and its conformity to those precedents ascertained? That course will save time and discussion, I think. I believe it is quite usual here, when a request is made by a Senator to have a bill lay over a day, so that he can examine it, to accede to his request. That is my understanding of the practice.

Mr. MORTON. The only objection is, the late period of the session. A postponement of this matter for one day, endangers the passage of the joint resolution through the House of Representatives. That is the only objection on my part. I care not how much examination there is of it. If the Senator from Oregon is specially desirous that it shall be laid over, I shall consent; but at the same time I give him my reason why I think it is not advisable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not so particular about it myself, but I am satisfied that there are other gentlemen more experienced in these matters who desire to examine the measure, and who will object to its passage at this time; and it is probable that upon examination and some formal amendments, it may be passed without much controversy.

Mr. MORTON. Very well. Let it go over.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that its further consideration be postponed until to-morrow. The motion was agreed to.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that he had approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 1) presenting the thanks of Congress to George Peabody;

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 15) for the relief of freedmen or destitute colored people in the District of Columbia; and lution entitled "A resolution to provide for the removal of the wreck of the steamship Scotland," approved January 29, 1867.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 84) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 85) to authorize the Southern Minnesota Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Mississippi river between La Crosse, in the State of Wisconsin, and the opposite bank of said river, in the State of Minnesota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. TIPTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 86) extending to the State of Nebraska the provisions of an act relating to agricultural colleges; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 87) to further define the qualifications of members of Congress; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 37) for the relief of First Lieutenant Henry B. Mears; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CRAGIN, the bill (S. No. 24) to regulate the selection of grand and petit jurors in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes, and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 10) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, heretofore introduced by him, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 38) authorizing the chief of Engineers to employ assistant civil engineers; which was read twice.

Mr. WILSON. I should like an explanation of that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask for its present consideration, and I will make a statement. It is known to the Senate that Congress at the last session ordered pretty extensive examinations and surveys to be made by the engineer department in several directions. It is said by that department that the regular force at their command is not adequate to the speedy and efficient execution of this work, and this resolution has the approval of that department. The Senate will judge of the propriety of it. If there be no objection to it I ask for its present consideration; otherwise, let it go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. This resolution provides for giving these persons the pay of a colonel of Engineers. What is that? That is a way of fixing compensation that I thought we had abandoned some years ago.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think this ought to be referred to some committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it ought to go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, because I suppose the chief duty is in relation to public works in this District.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Oh no; it has reference to civil engineers to assist in the surveys and examinations of rivers and harbors.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 88) making additional appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CALIFORNIA HARBORS.

Mr. COLE. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause investigation to be made as soon as practicable by the officers of the United States coast survey in California as to the existence of a harbor in the vicinity of Point Salie, on the coast of California; and that the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause estimates to be made by the proper officers of the amount necessary to be expended to render such harbor available for the purposes of commerce.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That had better go to the committee.

Mr. COLE. Very well; I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

DISCLOSURE OF EXECUTIVE PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer a resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Whereas it has frequently happened that the proceedings of the Senate in executive session have been published in the newspapers of the country in violation of the injunction of secrecy imposed thereon: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators be appointed by the Chair to inquire into and investigate the subject and report to the Senate; and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ a clerk if found necessary.

Mr. CONKLING. Before I know whether to object to the resolution or not I should like to hear from the Senator what the object is.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will listen to the reading of the resolution again, I think he will readily perceive the object. If it is taken up I am prepared to state more fully.

Mr. CONKLING. I did listen to all I could hear; I was interrupted for a moment while the preamble was being read.

Mr. CONNESS. Let the resolution be read again.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like very much to hear it.

The Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator has no objection, I wish he would let it lie over to another day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the resolution to-day.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator from New York objects, of course it will lie over; but I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CONKLING. I hardly wish to object; but I would rather make a suggestion to the Senator and confer with him about it.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I consent to its lying over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 20) to supply an omission in the enrollment of the act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House insisted on its second and third amendments to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 33) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. J. F. WILSON of Iowa, Mr. G. S. BOUTWELL of Massachusetts, and Mr. S. S. MARSHALL of Illinois, managers at the conference on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 22) in relation to a certain tract of land in Burlington, Iowa;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 26) providing for the necessary surveys for a ship-canal between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario for military, naval, and commercial purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 30) amending the ninth section of an act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved August 30, 1852.

SUPPLEMENTARY RECONSTRUCTION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the second and third amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 33) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate insist upon its disagreement, and agree to the conference asked by the House.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that I shall object to that; but I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Illinois to the fact that when the bill to which this is supplementary, at one stage of its progress, came from the other House, it came here with a request for a committee of conference, and a motion to have a committee of conference was denounced by him in very strong terms. It was said it was a question of too much importance to be sent to a committee of conference. If the Senator has really changed his mind, and now thinks a conference can be advantageously had, I shall not make any objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will say to my good friend from Maine that this is a disagreement on a single point. It does not open the whole bill. In that case the whole bill was open to a conference committee. This difference is upon a single point.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My friend has great ingenuity, and he can get away from anything, I have no doubt. He finds that there is some utility in a committee of conference, and that we are not to be destroyed by agreeing to have one after all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am very happy to have the congratulations of my friend from Maine upon this occasion; but I confess now I do not care very much about a committee of conference on this question. I do not know that there is very much to confer about. Still the other House have asked it, and as the disagreement is on a single point, I am willing to agree to it. If the Senate think otherwise I shall be quite satisfied.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore being authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, Messrs. TRUMBULL, WILSON, and BUCKALEW were appointed.

CORRECTION OF A MISTAKE.

Mr. SHERMAN. The House of Representatives have sent us a joint resolution to correct a mistake of the Enrolling Clerk, which ought to be passed at once. The Committee on Finance have examined it informally, and I desire to have it put upon its passage immediately.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 20) to supply an omission in the enrollment of the act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes, was read three times, and passed. It proposes to correct a mistake in the enrollment of the act of March 2, 1867, by inserting the words "Canada long-wools" in the paragraph headed "class two, down combing-wools."

CLOTHING FOR DESTITUTE SOLDIERS.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the bill (H. R. No. 19) to clothe the maimed and destitute soldiers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to require the Secretary of War to furnish annually one complete suit of clothing to each invalid soldier, who is an inmate of any regularly constituted "Soldiers' Home," in the United States, out of the stock on hand in the quartermaster's department. Such clothing is to be delivered to the managers of such institutions upon their requisition therefor, accompanied with such certificates as to numbers and condition as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

Mr. SHERMAN. We passed this morning a bill to accomplish all that we ought to do in this direction. There is a fund amounting to some eight million dollars, I think, to the credit of the disabled soldiers, which is placed under the charge of the National Asylum for Disabled Soldiers. We passed a bill this morning which authorized this fund to draw from the quartermaster's stores clothing for disabled soldiers at the original cost price, to be paid out of the fund. There is, therefore, in my judgment, no occasion for the passage of this bill. The only difference this would make would be that the clothing would be supplied out of the current appropriations for the War Department, or out of the supplies on hand of the quartermaster's department; but by a bill introduced by the Senator's colleague in the other House they are paid out of this fund, and it is the proper method of paying them. I see no occasion for the passage of this bill.

Mr. WILSON. This bill came to us from the House some days ago. I suppose the object is to provide for cases where there are asylums established by the States and by local communities. The soldiers in those establishments would not be provided for, I think, by the bill already passed. We have a large quantity of clothing on hand at this time which will last for a great while; and it was supposed that some of it might as well be worn out by these soldiers. If the Senator thinks the case is covered by the other bill, I shall not be very persistent in pressing this.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Under the other bill they have to pay for clothing.

Mr. SHERMAN. But they have to pay for it out of a fund which has $8,000,000 to its credit.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state how I understand this matter to stand. This bill will apply only to a class of persons who are in the Soldier's Homes in the various States. I can illustrate it best perhaps by referring to the one that is near my own residence. We have at Chicago a Soldier's Home, which has in it, I think, about one hundred soldiers ordinarily, entirely supported by contributions of benevolent persons. They have put up buildings and I think have raised probably two hundred thousand dollars in all. There are usually ninety or one hundred, sometimes more than a hundred soldiers there, some of them very destitute. Those who are able perhaps pay something; but they come to Chicago to be treated, a good many of them, for their eyes, and are entirely destitute. The establishment takes care of any soldier who is in that condition. The object of the bill is to furnish a suit of clothes to each one of that class of persons. That is the extent of the bill. I think the Senator from Ohio can have no objection to it. It is not intended as a general bill to furnish all soldiers.

Mr. SHERMAN. But it provides for furnishing one suit of clothes annually, and is to be continued.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But only while the United States has the clothing on hand. We have a vast amount of clothing now laid aside. It was provided for our armies during the war, it being supposed they would want it. Of course in time this clothing will become moth-eaten, and will be of no value to the Government. It will be a great relief to some of these charitable institutions to get some of this clothing. If the Government has not got it it will not be distributed under the bill. The extent of it is very little, and I really think there cannot be any objection to the bill. I trust the Senator from Ohio will withdraw his objection and let it pass.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to voting a suit of clothes to all the disabled soldiers in these charitable institutions.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is the extent of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it provides for one suit annually. Now, after this year national soldiers' asylums will be organized in every State of the Union with ample funds, and they will be under the regulation of persons authorized by the Government. Then every person who is entitled to receive the benefits of an asylum will go to these places and be subject to the discipline and the authority of the United States, and the clothing will be distributed by officers or persons appointed by the United States authorities. This provision would continue these persons in private charitable institutions, while the object of the law providing national asylums is to secure to the beneficiaries of this money homes provided by the national Government. If this bill were confined to one suit of clothing now I would not object to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well; strike out the word "annually."

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the bill with that amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move, then, to amend the bill by striking out the word "annually."

Mr. WILSON. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGES OVER THE MISSOURI AND MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 19.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 19) declaring a bridge to be constructed over the Missouri river at or near the town of St. Charles, and a bridge to be constructed over the Mississippi river at or near the city of Louisiana, in the State of Missouri, to be legal structures and post roads.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads reported the bill with amendments. The first amendment was in section one, line eighteen, to strike out the words "the State of Missouri" and to insert "any State in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches;" so that the clause will read:

And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, the cause may be tried before the district court of the United States of any State in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section five the following:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Missouri River Railroad Company, authorized by the Legislature of Kansas, may construct a bridge across the Missouri river, at or within two miles of the corporate limits of the city of Leavenworth, Kansas, upon the same terms and conditions provided for in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed. The title was amended so as to read: "A bill declaring a bridge to be constructed over the Missouri river at or near the town of St. Charles, and a bridge to be constructed over the Mississippi river at or near the city of Louisiana, in the State of Missouri, and a bridge to be constructed over the Missouri river at or near Leavenworth, Kansas, to be legal structures and post roads."

SENATOR FROM MARYLAND.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. JOHNSON. Before that is done I ask the honorable member to permit me to make a motion which I am about to make. I presented yesterday the credentials of Hon. Philip Francis Thomas as Senator on this floor. In consequence of the statements made on the floor of the Senate in relation to his right to a seat as a Senator, he informs me this morning that he is exceedingly anxious to have the inquiry made as to the truth of the charges at the earliest moment. He has requested me, therefore, to move that his credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 73) to exempt ladders from internal tax.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 21) relative to the issue of agricultural college scrip to the States lately in rebellion;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 22) to authorize the payment of Rev. C. B. BOYNTON, as Chaplain of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 23) relative to the publication of the treaties and laws of the United States.

ENROLLED RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 10) in relation to certain coin and bullion on special deposit in the Treasury; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

SUPPLEMENTARY RECONSTRUCTION BILL.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 33) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the House, and agree to the same.

That the House of Representatives recede from its third amendment to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with the following amendment: on page 5, line eleven, after the word "assembling" insert "and if it shall moreover appear to Congress that the election was one at which all the registered and qualified voters in the State had an opportunity to vote freely and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud, and if the Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors in the State," and that the Senate agree to the same.

LYMAN TRUMBULL,
CHARLES R. BUCKALEW,
HENRY WILSON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAMES F. WILSON,

GEORGE S. BOUTWELL,

SAMUEL S. MARSHALL,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the effect of that?

I do not understand.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The effect of it is this: the House recede from the disagreement to our amendment, which required, as the Senate will remember, a majority of the votes cast, a majority of the registered voters voting at the election, and agrees to it with this addition, which is, that when the constitution is presented Congress must be satisfied that all the registered voters in a State had a full and fair opportunity to vote, and that the constitution meets the approval of a majority of the qualified voters.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am satisfied.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. Do I understand that a majority of all the registered voters is not now required?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The word "registered" is put in before "qualified," but that does not alter it at all. The Senate disagreed to that before, though it might very properly have agreed to it. It is now left to a majority of the qualified registered voters voting upon a constitution; and a majority of the votes cast determines the question, provided a majority of all the registered voters participate in the election, just as we left it; and the other provision is that Congress must be satisfied when the constitution comes here that everybody has had an opportunity to participate in the election.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the chairman of the committee explain what is meant by the expression that it shall be made to appear that all the electors have had the opportunity to vote without the influence of fraud.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That means freely.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It says "freely" before.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is repeating it. We wanted it thoroughly indoctrinated into the minds of these people.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have but one remark to make. The gentlemen who constituted the Senate branch of this joint committee of conference were not particularly charmed with the phraseology of the amendment, but conceded to the House the insertion of these words, supposing it would do no harm. On the other, the vital point, to wit, the question of the number of votes to be required at the election, the House consented to our position. We therefore considered that we were carrying off the honors of the battle, and would allow these words to go in.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I should like to hear from the Senator who represented the minority on this committee of conference. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senate has got what it wants.

The report was concurred in.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 73) to exempt ladders from internal tax—to the Committee on Finance.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 22) to authorize the payment of Rev. C. B. BOYNTON, as Chaplain of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress—to the Committee on Appropriations.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 23) relative to the publication of the treaties and laws of the United States—to the Committee on Printing.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 21) relative to the issue of agricultural college scrip to the States lately in rebellion, was read twice by its title.

Mr. POMEROY. Let that lie on the table for the present. It can be considered informally by the Committee on Public Lands without a formal reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate again proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 19, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

On motion of Mr. BINGHAM, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with by unanimous consent.

DUTY ON WOOL AND WOOLENS.

Mr. BINGHAM. Congress at its last session passed a bill laying additional duties on imported wools and woolen goods. But when the bill came to be enrolled an error was committed by the accidental omission of three words. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution to correct the error. It will explain itself, without further words from me.

The joint resolution was read at length. The preamble states that in the enrollment of the bill entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, the words "Canada long wools" were inadvertently omitted from the paragraph designated under the heading "Class two, combing-wools," although said words were in the engrossed bill, and were intended to be a part of the act as passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

The joint resolution provides that the aforementioned act be amended by inserting the words "Canada long wools" after the words "down combing-wools," in the paragraph headed "Class two, combing-wools."

No objection being made, the joint resolution was received; read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISSUE OF AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE SCRIP.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution relative to the issue of agricultural college scrip to the States lately in rebellion.

Mr. BURR. Let the joint resolution be read.

The joint resolution was read at length. The preamble of the joint resolution recites that on the 3d day of April, 1866, by the authority and direction of the President of the United States, agricultural college scrip, covering nearly two hundred and seventy thousand acres, was issued and delivered to the State of North Carolina, under the act of Congress of July 5, 1862, providing for agricultural colleges; that by the same authority the General Land Office is now preparing to issue scrip in like manner to the States of Virginia, Georgia, and Mississippi; and that said action of the President takes for granted that said States are restored to their proper constitutional relation to the Union, and are to be recognized in all respects as entitled to the rights of the other States of the Union, which questions Congress alone can rightfully determine.

The joint resolution prohibits the further issue or delivery of such scrip to any of the States lately in rebellion against the United States, except the State of Tennessee, or the acceptance of such scrip, or of any heretofore issued, by the registers or receivers of any of the land offices of said States, until they shall be fully restored to their rights as States by Congress.

Mr. BURR. I object to the introduction of this joint resolution.

Mr. JULIAN. I move that the rules be suspended in order to permit the introduction of the joint resolution at this time.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 53, noes 19; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. JULIAN and Mr. NICHOLSON were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 69, noes 18.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

The joint resolution was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. JULIAN. I call for the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BURR. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 103, nays 24, not voting 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos B. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Calk, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eia, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Hamilton, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Keloham, Kitchen, Koontz, Ladin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Loughbridge, Mallory, Marvin, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paige, Perham, Peters, Pile, Plants, Poland, Polesky, Pomeroy, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Thomas, Townbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aersnam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Walker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen E. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—103.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barnes, Brooks, Burr, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Kerr, Marshall, Morgan, Morrissey, Niblack, Nicholson, Neill, Pruyn, Randall, Sitgreaves, Taber, Van Aiken, Van Trump, and Wood—24.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Boyer, Butler, Chanler, Dawes, Denison, Eliot, Griswold, Halsey, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Humphrey, Ingersoll, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, McCarthy, McCullough, Moorhead, Mungen, Myers, Phelps, Pike, Price, Raum, Robinson, Ross, Selye, Stewart, Stone, Taylor, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, William B. Washburn, and Thomas Williams—36.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF NATIONAL CURRENCY, ETC.

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at the present time a joint resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the national bank notes, bonds, and other Government printing to be done at the Government Printing Office in the city of Washington.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the joint resolution be read for information.

The joint resolution, which was read, recites in the preamble that it is inexpedient to have the Government printing done in the city of New York or other cities when the same can be done in the Government Printing Office at Washington as cheaply, or more cheaply, beside avoiding the expense of expressage. The joint resolution therefore proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the printing of the notes, bonds, and other Government printing to be done at the Government Printing Office in Washington; provided the same can be done as well and as cheaply as in the city of New York or elsewhere.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. MILLER. I move to suspend the rules to permit the introduction of the joint resolution.

On the motion there were—ayes 26, noes 57.

Mr. MILLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion to suspend the rules was not agreed to.

INTERNAL TAX ON LADDERS.

Mr. JUDD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at this time, a bill entitled "An act to exempt ladders from internal tax."

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read for information, after which the Chair will entertain any objection which may be made.

The bill, which was read, provides that ladders manufactured in whole or in part from wood, from and after the passage of the act, be entitled to the exemption provided for in section eleven of the act entitled "An act to amend existing laws relating to internal revenue, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867.

There being no objection, the bill was introduced, and read a first and second time.

Mr. SPALDING. I should like to hear some explanation of the bill.

Mr. JUDD. I propose to have read a short letter from one of my constituents, which, will, I think, explain this matter so clearly that no gentleman on this floor will object to the passage of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHICAGO, March 8, 1867.

DEAR SIR: In reading the amended revenue tax bill just passed I am surprised that ladders of all kinds are not included in the list of articles exempted from taxation, as about everything else made of wood is included in the bill. Probably the article was not thought of by any member of Congress or it would have been named in the list.

Within a few years past several factories have been started in different cities of the Union, making the manufacture of ladders an exclusive business, and by this means this class of goods have been much improved; but we have been so heavily taxed on all materials used, as well as on the article when sold, that it has been a precarious business. Now, that the tax has been removed from the entire class of wooden articles, with the exception of ladders, I have felt that to ask you would so get your influence to amend the law so as to include ladders of all kinds. Hoping you will consider an amendment of the kind an act of justice, and labor to secure it.

I am truly yours,

C. G. UDELL.

Hon. NORMAN B. JUDD.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, I have tested the accuracy of the statements contained in that letter by a reference to the internal revenue act, approved March 2, 1867. If members desire it I will read the various exemptions of articles manufactured of wood. It will be found that things, belonging to substantially the same class, but of very much greater magnitude as articles of manufacture than ladders, are by that act put upon the free list, while ladders have been omitted. The manufacture of ladders is a very small business at present, and needs, I think, the little encouragement which this exemption will give it. I hope the House will pass the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would inquire of the gentleman whether the raw materials entering into the manufacture of ladders are taxed. With regard to many articles included in the free list the tax has been taken off because the materials entering into their manufacture have already paid tax. It seems to me that to select a single article like this and put it upon the free list will be an exceptional kind of legislation, in which we ought not to engage at the present time. The bill passed yesterday at the instance of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] was merely to correct a mistake in the law in reference to a matter that had been legislated upon.

Now, if the gentleman may put in ladders or any other specific article in the free list, some other gentleman may vote to put in something else, and so we may go on perpetually.

I hope the gentleman will let me move to refer this bill to the Committee of Ways and Means when appointed.

Mr. JUDD. I will say to the honorable gentleman from Ohio that the larger portion of the cost of these things is the labor involved in their manufacture. The principal material is wood, but there are iron spikes and nails which I assume are necessary to be used for the completion of the article.

I will call attention to some of the articles exempted under the act to which this is an amendment: "brush-blocks." I do not see any reason why we should exempt brush-blocks and not ladders:

"Casks, churns, barrels, wooden brushes and broom handles, tanks, and kists made of wood, including cooperage of all kinds, bungs and plugs, packing-boxes, nest-boxes, and match-boxes, whether made of wood or other materials; wooden hames, plow beams, split-bottom chairs, and turned materials for the same unmanufactured, and saddle-trees made of wood, and match-boxes heretofore made on which a tax has not been paid.

Horse-rakes, horse-powers, tedders, hames, scythes, snaths, hay-forks, hoes, and portable grinding mills. Potato-hooks, pitchforks, manure and spading forks.

Pumps, garden-engines, and hydraulic rams. Steds, wheelbarrows, and hand-carts, and fence made of wood."

As was stated yesterday, ladders were overlooked, or they, too, would have been exempted. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope it will not be seconded.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 41, noes 41.

Mr. RANDALL called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. RANDALL, and Mr. JUDD were appointed.

The House again divided and the tellers reported—ayes 49, noes 44.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be now put.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I hope the gentleman will modify his bill so as to include "stoves."

Mr. JUDD. I will do anything, I will say, if in order, for my friend from Ohio; but when I asked yesterday to have this added to a bill to which I thought it was germane, gentlemen told me not to embarrass their measure and they would help me to pass mine. Mine is here now, and I hope the gentleman will not embarrass it with his proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD moved that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. RANDALL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 61, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Archer, James M. Ashley, Barnes, Beaman, Blair, Boutwell, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Driggs, Eldridge, Fields, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Ketcham, Laffin, Lincoln, Morgan, Mungen, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Paine, Perham, Polsley, Pomeroy, Randall, Robertson, Schenck, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Taber, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Auken, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, and Wood—59.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Benjamin, Bingham, Bromwell, Buckland, Burr, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferry, Gravely, Hamilton, Hayes, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kerr, Kitchon, William Lawrence, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, Marshall, McClurg, Mercur, Miller, Moore, Morrell, O'Neill, Peters, Pile, Plants, Poland, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Wyck, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, and John T. Wilson—61.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Banks, Blaine, Butler, Cake, Chanler, Cornell, Covode, Daves, Denison, Ela, Eliot, Ferriss, Griswold, Halsey, Harding, Hill, Hooper, Ingersoll, Kelsey, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrissey, Myers, Phelps, Pike, Price, Pruyn, Raum, Robinson, Selye, Stone, Ward, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—43.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. PAINE demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 53.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. JUDD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate concurred in the first and fourth amendments, and disagreed to the second and third amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 33, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration.

It also informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 39) to provide means for the prosecution of work on the distributing reservoir of the Washington aqueduct;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) to make valid the laws of New Mexico passed at the session of the Legislature held at Santa Fé from the 3d day of December, 1866, to the 31st of January, 1867; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) directing the Secretary of War to furnish certain arms and equipments to the State of Tennessee.

WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, Senate bill No. 39, to provide means for the prosecution of the work on the distributing reservoir of the Washington aqueduct, was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move its reference to the Committee on Appropriations when appointed. It contains an appropriation.

Mr. KELSEY. I move its reference to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I think it ought to go the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole has priority.

The question being taken on the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole, it was disagreed to—ayes 37, noes 56.

The bill was then ordered to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations when appointed.

GOVERNMENT OF THE REBEL STATES.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, the House took up from the Speaker's table the message of the Senate in relation to the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 33, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the House insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the Senate, and request a committee of conference, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the House recede from its amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendments disagreed to by the Senate be reported.

The Clerk reported the amendments, as follows:

On page 5, line four, after the word "the," where it occurs the second time insert the word "registered."

On the same page, after the word "specified" in line five strike out the words "cast at said election, (at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification)."

The section, as amended, reads as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the registered electors qualified as herein specified, the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session then immediately upon its next assembling, &c.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was stated first on the motion to recede.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 62, nays 78, not voting 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barnes, Bingham, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Coburn, Cornell, Eldridge, Ferry, Fields, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Kerr, Kitchon, Koontz, Mallory, Marshall, Miller, Moore, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Stewart, Taber, Thomas, Twitchell, Van Auken, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, John T. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—62.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Butler, Cake, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Covode, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Finney, Garfield, Gravely, Hayes, Hopkins, Hulburd, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Laffin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Marvin, McClurg, Mercur, Morrell, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pile, Pomeroy, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—78.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banks, Bromwell, Cullom, Dawes, Denison, Donnelly, Eliot, Griswold, Harding, Hill, Ingersoll, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, McCarthy, McCullough, Moorhead, Myers, Phelps, Pike, Price, Raum, Stone, and William B. Washburn—23.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to insist on the amendment of the House disagreed to by the Senate, and ask for a committee of conference; and it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Messrs. WILSON, of Iowa, BOUTWELL, and MARSHALL.

ENROLLED BILL AND RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 22) in relation to a certain tract of land in Burlington, Iowa;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 26) providing for the necessary surveys for a ship-canal between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario for military, naval, and commercial purposes; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 80) amending the ninth section of "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes,'" approved August 30, 1852.

CHAPLAIN OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and put upon its passage a joint resolution to authorize the payment of Rev. C. B. BOYNTON, as Chaplain of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be reported.

The joint resolution was read at length. It authorizes Rev. CHARLES B. BOYNTON to draw the amount appropriated for the payment of the Chaplain of the House for the Fortieth Congress, and appropriates a sum sufficient to pay him the usual salary for the present fiscal year.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The Department construes the law in such a manner that unless the name of the Chaplain is given he cannot draw the amount appropriated for his pay. A similar joint resolution for the same purpose was passed last year.

Mr. MUNGEN. I would inquire of the Chair what is the usual salary of the Chaplain?

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of parliamentary rules; but the Chair can answer the gentleman. The salary is about nine hundred dollars.

No objection being made, the joint resolution was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. PILE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House be requested to appoint a special committee on the improvement of the Mississippi river and its tributaries, to consist of seven members, to whom shall be referred all memorials, petitions, maps, surveys, and reports in relation to the improvement of the Mississippi river and its tributaries, and the construction of levees on the lower Mississippi and Red rivers, with authority to sit during the recess of this House, and to employ a clerk at the same compensation as clerk of the Committee on Commerce, for the purpose of examining the progress of work or the upper and lower rapids of the Mississippi river: the character of lands offered by the State of Louisiana to the United States Government as security for guarantying bonds of said State to be used in the construction of levees, collect facts and statistics relating to these subjects; and that said committee be instructed to report at the next regular session of this House by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. CHANLER. I will object unless the gentleman will include the wharves and docks of the city and harbor of New York.

Mr. WARD. And the Hudson and Susquehanna rivers.

PUBLICATION OF LAWS AND TREATIES.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at this time a joint resolution relative to the publication of the treaties and laws of the United States.

The joint resolution was read at length. It provides that so much of section seven of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, as relates to the publication of the treaties and laws of the United States, shall be extended to the States not therein designated and to the Territories; provided that the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to print the laws and treaties of the United States as aforesaid in three newspapers in Louisiana.

Mr. KELSEY and Mr. CHANLER objected to the introduction of the joint resolution.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The object of this joint resolution is merely to make the provisions of the section of the act referred to in it apply to all the States and Territories alike; and also to allow the publication of the laws and treaties of the United States in three newspapers in Louisiana, instead of two only, as now provided by law. It is urged that the publication in two papers in Louisiana will not be sufficient.

Mr. KELSEY and Mr. CHANLER withdrew their objection.

The joint resolution was then received, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLERKS IN THE DEPARTMENTS.*

Mr. NOELL. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of War, Navy, Treasury, State, Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Commissioner of Agriculture be requested to report to this House the number and names of clerks and employes in their respective Departments, their grades and classes, with length of service, and the State, Territory or district from which each was appointed.

Mr. CULLOM objected.

CLAIMS OF LOYALISTS FOR DAMAGES.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I desire, if it shall be the pleasure of the House, to call up for consideration at this time a motion submitted by myself on the 11th instant, to reconsider the vote by which the House referred to the Committee of the Whole the bill of the House No. 29, relative to damages done to loyal men, and for other purposes. I desire to call up the motion for the purpose of making a speech upon it while the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the supplementary reconstruction bill are engaged upon that subject. I will agree to yield as soon as that committee come in with their report. I desire to make the speech to-day, as otherwise I probably will not have an opportunity to make it this session.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is a privileged question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, rising to call up that motion, is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. BOYER. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] is entitled in this way to get possession of the floor without a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read Rule 49, to be found on page 164 of the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

"When a motion has been once made and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move for the reconsideration thereof, on the same or succeeding day; and such motion shall take precedence of all other questions, except a motion to adjourn; and shall not be withdrawn after the said succeeding day without the consent of the House, and thereafter any member may call it up for consideration."

The SPEAKER. This bill was introduced March 11, 1867; read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole. On the same day the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] having voted with the majority on the reference of the bill, moved to reconsider the vote by which it had been referred. That motion being called up now has priority of all other questions except a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BOYER. Would it be in order now to move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table?

The SPEAKER. That motion will be in order when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] shall have concluded his remarks. He is entitled under the rule to one hour to discuss the question.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to inquire whether the gentleman gave notice within the rule of his intention to move a reconsideration.

The SPEAKER. The motion was entered on the day on which the bill was referred.

Mr. WOOD. Is there any record of that fact?

The SPEAKER. The motion is journalized. Otherwise it could not be called up. On page 6 of the Daily Order of Business for Monday, March 18, will be found the following:

Motions passed and motions to reconsider pending—Privileged.

March 11, 1867. A bill (H. R. No. 29) relative to damages done to loyal men, and for other purposes. Read twice and referred to a Committee of the Whole House for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed. Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote referring said bill. Question. Shall the said vote be reconsidered?

Mr. WOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he intends to withdraw the motion, or to move the previous question at the conclusion of his speech and deprive this side of the House of all opportunity to reply to him.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that I do not intend to move the previous question. I propose to allow the fullest debate which gentlemen can desire. I do not wish to prejudice in any way the rights of gentlemen on that side.

Before proceeding with my remarks I ask the Clerk to read the bill now before the House on the motion to reconsider.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is due to justice, as an example to future times, that some proper punishment should be inflicted on the people who constituted the "confederate States of America," both because they, declaring an unjust war against the United States for the purpose of destroying republican liberty and permanently establishing slavery, as well as for the cruel and barbarous manner in which they conducted said war, in violation of all the laws of civilized warfare, and also to compel them to make some compensation for the damages and expenditures caused by said war: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all the public lands belonging to the ten States that formed the government of the so-called "confederate States of America" shall be forfeited by said States and become forthwith vested in the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President shall forthwith proceed to cause the seizure of such of the property belonging to the belligerent enemy as is deemed forfeited by the act of July 17, A. D. 1862, and hold and appropriate the same as enemy's property, and to proceed to condemnation with that already seized.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in lieu of the proceeding to condemn the property thus seized as enemy's property, as is provided by the act of July 17, A. D. 1862, two commissions or more, as by him may be deemed necessary, shall be appointed by the President for each of the said "confederate States," to consist of three persons each, one of whom shall be an officer of the late or present Army, and two shall be civilians, neither of whom shall be citizens of the State for which he shall be appointed; and that the said commissions shall proceed to adjudicate and condemn the property aforesaid, under such forms and proceedings as shall be prescribed by the Attorney General of the United States, whereupon the title to said property shall become vested in the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That out of the lands thus seized and confiscated the slaves who have been liberated by the operations of the war and the amendment to the Constitution or otherwise, who resided in said "confederate States" on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1861, or since, shall have distributed to them as follows, namely: to each male person who is the head of a family, forty acres; to each adult male, whether the head of a family or not, forty acres; to each widow who is the head of a family, forty acres—to be held by them in fee-simple, but to be inalienable for the next ten years after they become seized thereof. For the purpose of distributing and allotting said land the Secretary of War shall appoint as many commissions in each State as he shall deem necessary, to consist of three members each, two of whom at least shall not be citizens of the State for which he is appointed. Each of said commissions shall receive a salary of $3,000 annually and all his necessary expenses. Each commission shall be allowed one clerk, whose salary shall be $2,000 per annum. The title to the homestead aforesaid shall be vested in trustees for the use of the liberated persons aforesaid. Trustees shall be appointed by the Secretary of War, and shall receive such salary as he shall direct, not exceeding $3,000 per annum. At the end of ten years the absolute title to said homesteads shall be conveyed to said owners or to the heirs of each as are then dead.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That out of the balance of the property thus seized and confiscated there shall be raised, in the manner hereinafter provided, a sum equal to fifty dollars, for each homestead, to be applied by the trustees hereinafter mentioned toward the erection of buildings on the said homesteads for the use of said slaves; and the further sum of $500,000,000, which shall be appropriated as follows, to wit: $200,000,000 shall be invested in United States six per cent. securities; and the interest thereof shall be semi-annually added to the pensions allowed by law to pensioners who have become so by reason of the late war; $300,000,000, or so much thereof as may be needed, shall be appropriated to pay damages done to loyal citizens by the civil or military operations of the government lately called the "confederate States of America."

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That in order that just discrimination may be made, the property of no one shall be seized whose whole estate on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1865, was not worth more than $5,000, to be valued by the said commission, unless he shall have voluntarily become an officer or employe in the military or civil service of the "confederate States of America," or in the civil or military service of some one of said States, and in enforcing all confiscations the sum or value of $5,000 in real or personal property shall be left or assigned to the delinquent.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the commission shall put a just and impartial valuation on all the property thus seized and forfeited, and when such valuation shall be completed in the several States all the said commissioners shall meet in the city of Washington and assess the $500,000,000 aforesaid, as well as the allowances for homestead buildings, pro rata, on each of the properties or estates thus seized, and shall give notice of such assessment and apportionment by publication for sixty days in two daily newspapers in the city of Washington, and in two daily newspapers in the capitals of each of the said "confederate States."

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That if the owners of said seized and forfeited estates shall, within ninety days after the first of said publications, pay into the Treasury of the United States the sum assessed on their estates respectively, all of their estates and lands not actually appropriated to the liberated slaves shall be released and restored to their owners.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all the land, estates, and property, of whatever kind, which shall not be redeemed as aforesaid within ninety days, shall be sold and converted into money, in such time and manner as may be deemed by the said commissioners most advantageous to the United States; Provided, That no arable land shall be sold in larger tracts than five hundred acres: And provided further, That no longer credit shall be given than three years.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am about to discuss the question of the punishment of belligerent traitors by enforcing the confiscation of their property to a certain extent, both as a punishment for their crimes and to pay the loyal men who have been robbed by the rebels, and to increase the pensions of our wounded soldiers. The punishment of traitors has been wholly ignored by a treacherous Executive and by a sluggish Congress. I wish to make an issue before the American people and see whether they will sanction the perfect impunity of a murderous belligerent, and consent that the loyal men of this nation, who have been despoiled of their property, shall remain without remuneration, either by the rebel property or the property of the nation.

To this issue I desire to devote the small remnant of my life. I desire to make the issue before the people of my own State, and should be glad if the issue were to extend to other States. I desire the verdict of the people upon this great question.

This bill is important to several classes of people.

It is important to our wounded and maimed soldiers, who are unable to work for their living, and whose present pensions are wholly inadequate to their support. It is important to those bereaved wives and parents whose habiliments of woe are to be seen in every house, and proclaim the cruel losses which have been inflicted on them by the murderous hands of traitors.

It is important to the loyal men, North and South, who have been plundered and impoverished by rebel raiders and rebel Legislatures.

It is important to four millions of injured, oppressed, and helpless men, whose ancestors for two centuries have been held in bondage and compelled to earn the very property a small portion of which we propose to restore to them, and who are now destitute, helpless, and exposed to want and starvation under the deliberate cruelty of their former masters.

It is also important to the delinquents whose property it takes as a fine—a punishment for the great crime of making war to destroy the Republic, and for prosecuting the war in violation of all the rules of civilized warfare. It is certainly too small a punishment for so deep a crime, and too slight a warning to future ages.

No committee or party is responsible for this bill. It is chargeable to the President and myself. Whatever merit it possesses is due to Andrew Johnson. In the summer of 1864 he said in a public speech:

"Let me say now is the time to secure those fundamental principles, while the land is rent with anarchy and upheaves with the throes of a mighty revolution. While society is in this disordered state and we are seeking security, let us fix the foundations of the Government on the principles of eternal justice, which will endure for all time."

"Shall he who brought this misery upon the State be permitted to control its destinies? If this be so, then all this precious blood of our brave soldiers and officers, so freely poured out, will have been wantonly spilled. All the glorious victories won by our noble armies will go for naught, and all the battle-fields which have been sown with dead heroes during the rebellion will have been made memorable in vain."

"Why all this carnage and devastation? It was that treason might be put down and traitors punished. I say the traitor has ceased to be a citizen, and in joining the rebellion has become a public enemy."

"Treason must be made odious, and traitors must be punished and impoverished; their great plantations must be seized and divided into small portions, and sold to honest, industrious men. The day for protecting the lands and negroes of these authors of rebellion is past. It is high time it was. I have been most deeply pained at some things which have come under my observation. We get men in command, who, under the influence of flattery, fawning, and caressing, grant protection to the traitor, while the poor Union man stands out in the cold."

This is all the eloquent language of Andrew Johnson as "he was." This was the text which I took up and elaborated in a speech to my constituents at Lancaster in September, 1865, and which has been much criticised by humane sympathizers with rebels. Andrew Johnson was the apostle whose preachings I followed. His doctrine pervades and animates this whole bill. Whatever of justice is in it is due to him. I call upon his friends to stand by him in this, his favorite policy. If you now desert him, who can you expect to defend the "much-enduring man" at the other end of the avenue? Having thus rendered unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, I will proceed to defend the course recommended by him, who above all others knows what is due to traitors.

This bill, it seems to me, can be condemned only by the criminals and their immediate friends, and by that unmanly kind of men whose intellectual and moral vigor has melted into a fluid weakness which they mistake for mercy, and which is untempered with a single grain of justice, and to those religionists who mistake meanness for Christianity, and who forget that the essence of religion is to "do unto others what others have a right to expect from you." It is offensive to certain pretentious doctors of divinity who are mawkishly prating about the "fatted calf, the prodigal son, and the forgiving father." They forget that there is no analogy between the cases. The thoughtless youth having received a part of his father's estate, and probably taking a load of corn to market, fell into bad company and contracted the loathsome vice of drunkenness, and spent the money in rioting and debauchery, and, like all drunkards, made his bed with the swine and fed on husks; but like one case only in a thousand he reformed, joined the total abstinence society, washed himself clean, brushed his clothes, and with repentant steps returned to his father's house. Well might his aged parent rejoice; well might he kill the fatted calf at such a rescue. But how venial was such offense compared with this murderous rebellion!

When the great ancestor of this bloody race had slain his brother, and tremblingly met his Judge and sought for pardon, what was the answer? "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground. And now art thou cursed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand. When thou tillest the ground it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth." "When Cain cried out that his 'punishment was more than he could bear,' the Judge who administered justice in mercy drove him forth into stern, inexorable exile. He taught no forgiveness for such sins. He prated of no 'fatted calves.'"

I proceed to consider the bill. By the act of 17th July, 1862, treason is made punishable by death or some smaller punishment, at the discretion of the court. Before punishment can be inflicted for treason or misprision of treason the party must be duly convicted in a court of the United States. Not so with the balance of the bill. All the rest of that law (after the first four sections) refers to persons engaged in the belligerent army, or officially connected with the government known as the "confederate States of America," or to those who voluntarily aided that power. While that law supposed that most of the people composing that army and government were traitors, yet they are dealt with in all the provisions which refer to confiscation merely as belligerents making an unjust war. The forfeitures which follow from a conviction for treason are left to the operations of the common law.

The fifth section enacts that—

To insure the speedy termination of the present rebellion it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to cause the seizure of all the estates and property, money, stocks, credits, and effects of the persons hereinafter named in this section, and apply and use the same and the proceeds thereof for the support of the Army of the United States.

Then follow the enumeration of all the officers of the army and navy of the confederate government; all the civil officers of said government; all persons engaged in the army or navy, or aiding said confederate States of America, unless they laid down their arms within a given time.

To secure the condemnation of property thus seized, proceedings in rem are to be instituted wherever the property may be found, which proceeding shall follow the proceedings in admiralty or revenue cases, and the same shall be condemned as enemies' property, and become the property of the United States, and the proceeds paid into the Treasury of the United States. (Seventh section act of 17th July, 1862.) The eighth section provides that the court shall make all necessary orders, and the marshal shall make deeds and conveyances for such property to the purchaser, and then such titles shall be good and valid.

This law is unrepealed. It is in full force, and stands on the statute-book as one of the laws which the President swore to execute. (Would to God he had obeyed his oath! Let us see that we obey ours.)

It may be objected that the Government is stretching its powers in making such confiscations. That was a question well considered when the act of 1862 was passed. It must be remembered that this is not an open question; we are merely considering the enforcement of an existing law. But I will briefly review some of the arguments in favor of the right. We are treating these belligerents simply as enemies, and their property as enemies' property now in the possession and power of the conqueror. By the law of nations in its most stringent provision all the property, liberty, and lives of a conquered enemy who has waged an unjust war are at the disposal of the victor. Modern civilization will seldom justify the exercise of the extreme right. The lives, the liberty, and, in most cases, the real property of the vanquished are left untouched. The property, however, of the vanquished is held in some shape liable to pay the expenses and damages sustained by the injured party. If peace is brought about by treaty, it is usually stipulated that the expenses and damages shall be paid by the defeated belligerent. As such remuneration must be levied as taxes on the subjects, it does subject all their property to this burden. Where there is no government capable of making terms of peace, the law-making power of the conqueror must fix the terms. This gives them sufficient right to take just such property as it may deem proper. Where the subdued belligerent is composed of traitors, their personal crimes aggravate their belligerent offense and justify severer treatment, just as a tribe of savages are treated with more rigor than civilized foes.

From such a people much more might and ought to be exacted than from an honorable enemy. Whenever example requires it, heavy fines should be imposed and the criminals reduced to poverty, as was properly required by our excellent President. Vattel says:

"When, therefore, he has subdued a hostile nation, he undeniably may, in the first place, do himself justice respecting the object which has given rise to the war, and indemnify himself for the expenses and damages which he has sustained by it."

Halleck (page 457) says that by strict right property on land and real estate is subject to seizure, though seldom enforced with an ordinary enemy.

All writers agree with Vattel (page 369)—

"Thus a conqueror who has taken up arms not only against the sovereign, but against the nation herself, and whose intention it was to subdue a fierce and savage people, and once for all to reduce an obstinate enemy, such a conqueror may with justice lay burdens on the conquered nation, both as compensation for the expenses of the war and as a punishment."

Apply these principles to the case in hand. The cause of the war was slavery. We have liberated the slaves. It is our duty to protect them, and provide for them while they are unable to provide for themselves. Have we not a right, in the language of Vattel, "to do ourselves justice respecting the object which has caused the war," by taking lands for home-steads for these "objects" of the war?

Have we not a right, if we chose to go to that extent, to indemnify ourselves for the expenses and damages caused by the war? We might make the property of the enemy pay the $4,000,000,000 which we have expended, as well as the damages inflicted on loyal men by confiscation and invasion, which might reach $1,000,000,000 more. This bill is merciful, asking less than one tenth of our just claims.

We could be further justified in inflicting severe penalties upon this whole hostile people as "a fierce and savage people," as an "obstinate enemy," whom it is a duty to tame and punish. Our future safety require stern justice.

What more "savage or fierce people" than they who deliberately starved to death sixty thousand prisoners of war; who shot or reduced to bondage all captive soldiers of the colored race; who sought to burn our cities through secret agents; who sent infected materials into our most populous towns to destroy non-combatants, old men, women, and children, by the most loathsome and fatal diseases; and who consummated their barbarism by the assassination of the mildest of rulers and the best of men? If this is not a "fierce and savage enemy" whom we have a right to reduce to absolute submission and dependence, point me out one to which the language of Vattel will apply. You would do great injustice to those mild savages who owed us no allegiance by pointing to those who perpetrated the massacre of Wyoming; or to the Camanches or the wild Indians of the West, or the fierce tribes of the Oronoco—and yet you seize their lands and expel them from their native country.

I suppose none will deny the right to confiscate the property of the several belligerent States, as they all made war as States; or of the confederate States of America; for no one ever denied the right of the conqueror to the crown property of the vanquished sovereign, even where the seizure of private property would not be justified by the circumstances.

That would give us all called for by the first section of the bill. I believe Texas has about one hundred and ten million acres. She retained all her public lands at the time of annexation on the condition of paying her own debts; and afterward called on the United States Government for the payment of those very debts, and procured it. I know not how much the other States may have; possibly enough to make up, with Texas, one hundred and fifty million acres. But it is said that any of the property of the sovereign is subject to seizure by the conqueror; in ordinary wars between monarchies such is the fact; but that is not the case where war is made on a whole hostile people—"a fierce and savage people." But, admitting the limitation to prevail, still it does not obstruct us.

Here is a belligerent made up of men whose crimes had forfeited all their rights, independently of their belligerent liabilities. But beyond that, the case of republics is very different from absolute governments, where the people are responsible for nothing, are guilty of nothing. The sovereign and his estate may well be distinguished from his subjects and their estates. But in republics, the people—the whole people—are the sovereigns. All the responsibility of the acts of the Government falls upon all the people. Their individual property must answer for the expenses, damages, and indemnities which fall on the Government of the nation. The Romans, from whom we derive our national law, held that the private property of every citizen might be seized, because he was a sovereign, a part of the governing power.

But it matters not what you may think of the efficiency of the act of July 17, 1862. The laws of war authorize us to take this property by our sovereign power; by a law now to be passed. We have a subdued enemy in our power; we have all their property and lives at our disposal. No peace has been formed. No terms of peace or of reconciliation have been yet proclaimed, unless the proclamation of the President can make peace and war. The Constitution denies him any power in either case. Then, unless Andrew Johnson be king, the terms of peace are yet to be proclaimed. Among those terms, as we have shown, we have a right to impose confiscation of all their property—to "impoverish" them, as Andrew Johnson has told us; to "divide their large farms and sell them to industrious men." This is strict law and good common sense. Now, then, without reference to any former act, we have a right to seize the property named in this bill, and ten times more. You behold at your feet a conquered foe, an atrocious enemy. Tell him on what terms he may arise and depart or remain loyal. But do not embrace him too hastily. Be sure first that there is no dagger in his girdle. The President has been throwing thick around him decrees and proclamations and speeches upon subjects wholly beyond his jurisdiction. He assumes that his declaration of a fact creates a fact, however false it may be. His constitutions dictated to hordes of rebels; his declaration that the States are States in the Union; his proclamation that peace is restored, he has cunningly put forth as cumulative evidence of the condition of the "confederate States." Not one of them is any better than waste paper.

All put together are but accumulated nonsense. Does he expect to deceive or to bewilder Congress by such incoherent assumptions? I think that Congress will proceed in that calm, unimpassioned, but unwavering course which distinguishes the statesman from the demagogue.

Having, as I conceive, justified the bill which I seek to have enforced, let us now look to the provisions of the bill under consideration:

The first section orders the confiscation of all the property belonging to the State governments, and the national government which made war upon us, and which we have conquered. I presume no one is prepared to object to this unless it be those who condemned the conquest. To them I have nothing to say, except to hope that they will continue consistent in their love of the rebels; to show an exuberant humanity into which is merged and submerged all the exalted feelings of patriotism.

The second section requires the President to execute an existing law which he is sworn to execute, but the performance of which oath is in abeyance. Certainly such law should be enforced or repealed; it is a mockery to allow it to stand on your statute-books and be not only not enforced, but violated every day by the executive government.

The third section furnishes a more convenient and speedy mode of adjudicating such forfeitures, and more consistent with the military condition of the conquered States.

The fourth section provides first that out of the lands thus confiscated each liberated slave who is a male adult, or the head of a family, shall have assigned to him a homestead of forty acres of land, (with $100 to build a dwelling,) which shall be held for them by trustees during their pupillage.

Let us consider whether this is a just and politic provision.

Whatever may be the fate of the rest of the bill I must earnestly pray that this may not be defeated. On its success, in my judgment, depends not only the happiness and respectability of the colored race, but their very existence. Homesteads to them are far more valuable than the immediate right of suffrage, though both are their due.

Four million persons have just been freed from a condition of dependence, wholly unacquainted with business transactions, kept systematically in ignorance of all their rights and of the common elements of education, without which none of any race are competent to earn an honest living, to guard against the frauds which will always be practiced on the ignorant, or to judge of the most judicious manner of applying their labor. But few of them are mechanics, and none of them skilled manufacturers. They must necessarily, therefore, be the servants and the victims of others unless they are made in some measure independent of their wiser neighbors. The guardianship of the Freedmen's Bureau, that benevolent institution, cannot be expected long to protect them. It encounters the hostility of the old slaveholders, whether in official or private station, because it deprives these dethroned tyrants of the luxury of despotism. In its nature it is not calculated for a permanent institution. Withdraw that protection and leave them a prey to the legislation and treatment of their former masters, and the evidence already furnished shows that they will soon become extinct, or be driven to defend themselves by civil war. Withhold from them all their rights, and leave them destitute of the means of earning a livelihood, the victims of the hatred or cupidity of the rebels whom they helped to conquer, and it seems probable that the war of races might ensue which the President feared would arise from kind treatment and the restoration of their rights. I doubt not that hundreds of thousands would annually be deposited in secret, unknown graves. Such is already the course of their rebel murderers; and it is done with impunity. The clearest evidence of that fact has already been shown by the testimony taken by the "Central Directory." Make them independent of their old masters, so that they may not be compelled to work for them upon unfair terms, which can only be done by giving them a small tract of land to cultivate for themselves, and you remove all this danger. You also elevate the character of the freedman. Nothing is so likely to make a man a good citizen as to make him a freeholder. Nothing will so multiply the productions of the South as to divide it into small farms. Nothing will make men so industrious and moral as to let them feel that they are above want and are the owners of the soil which they till. It will also be of service to the white inhabitants. They will have constantly among them industrious laborers, anxious to work for fair wages. How is it possible for them to cultivate their lands if these people were expelled? If Moses should lead or drive them into exile, or carry out the absurd idea of colonizing them, the South would become a barren waste.

When that wisest of monarchs, the Czar of Russia, compelled the liberation of twenty-five million serfs, he did not for a moment entertain the foolish idea of depriving his empire of their labor or of robbing them of their rights. He ordered their former owners to make some compensation for their unrequited toil by conveying to them the very houses in which they lived and a portion of the land which they had tilled as serfs. The experiment has been a perfect success. It has brought the prosperity which God gives to wisdom and justice. Have they not a right to it? I do not speak of their fidelity and services in this bloody war. I put it on the mere score of lawful earnings. They and their ancestors have toiled, not for years, but for ages, without one farthing of recompense. They have earned for their masters this very land and much more. Will not he who denies them compensation now be accused, for he is an unjust man? Have we not upon this subject the recorded decision of a Judge who never erred? Four million Jews were held in bondage in Egypt. Their slavery was mild compared with the slavery inflicted by Christians. For of all recorded slavery—Pagan, heathen, or Mohammedan—Christian slavery has been the most cruel and heartless; and of all Christian slavery American slavery has been the worst. God, through no pretended, but a true Moses, led them out of bondage, as in our case, through a Red sea, at the cost, as in our case, of the first born of every household of the oppressor. Did He advise them to take no remuneration for their years of labor? No! He understood too well what was due to justice. He commanded the men and the women to borrow from their confiding neighbors "jewels of silver and jewels of gold and raiment." They obeyed him amply, and spoiled the Egyptians, and went forth full-handed. There was no blasphemer then to question God's decree of confiscation. This doctrine then was not "satanic." He who questions it now will be a blasphemer, whom God will bring to judgment. If we refuse to this downtrodden and oppressed race the rights which Heaven decreed them, and the remuneration which they have earned through long years of hopeless oppression, how can we hope to escape still further punishment if God is just and omnipotent? It may come in the shape of plagues or of intestine wars—race against race, the oppressed against the oppressor. But come it will. Seek not to divert our attention from justice by a puerile cry about fatted calves!

The fifth section provides that $500,000,000 shall be raised out of the confiscated property for two purposes: the increase of the pensions of our soldiers and the payment to loyal despoiled citizens. Is there any injustice in this? We have seen that by the law of nations they were liable to pay all the expenses and damages of the war. Those expenses cannot be less than five billion dollars, including our debt and what was paid with taxes; the damages were probably half a billion more. To exact but one tenth part is mercy unexampled in national magnanimity. In the great mutiny in India, in which so many millions of the original owners of the soil were engaged, and who held proprietary rights under well-defined titles, the Government declared that their engagements had been canceled by the rebellion, and that the proprietary right in the soil was confiscated to the Government, which would dispose of that "right as to it might seem fitting." No one ever complained that this exceeded the power of the victors. Why so tender when a small punishment is to be inflicted on our enemy? Three hundred million dollars put at interest at six per cent. would just about double present pensions. Eight dollars a month to men unable to work is wholly inadequate to their necessities. That rate was fixed when the pay of soldiers was but eight dollars per month; it is now sixteen dollars. The increased price of all the necessities of life renders that necessary. The pensions should be increased in the same proportion. Their present allowance is a mere mockery; it must be doubled out of some fund. Shall it be at the cost of loyal men, or of those who mangled and slew our noble soldiers? You talk of pity. Pity for whom? Your tears flow for pompous traitors; ours for maimed, halting, crippled patriots.

I know there is a cry for the perfect impunity of the enemy. It is a dangerous and unwholesome doctrine. Inflict salutary punishments to prevent future civil wars and to punish the criminals; "their brothers' blood cries to us from the earth which has opened its mouth to receive their brothers' blood from their hands;" all this blood cannot sink into the ground unavenged; the ghosts of these murdered martyrs will not down, but will haunt their murderers to the bar of eternal judgment.

Is there anything in the practice of nations to condemn this confiscation? Nothing; but everything to justify it. When a city or people in alliance with Rome conspired to levy war against her, on being conquered she was not unfrequently deprived of half her population and their lands taken and given to Roman colonists. Where all is justly forfeited, including their lives, to leave them a part is great mercy. I need not cite the examples of Greece and Macedonia. They were severer than Rome. Now, I would not exact much personal punishment. I have never believed in bloody penalties. I have long since adopted the milder views of Boccarina and Montesquieu. But when I say that, it does not mean impunity to criminals. Heavy pecuniary punishments should take the place of personal inflictions. Rome at one time decreed that no blood should be shed except in hostile conflict. But for making war on the republic and lesser crimes she interdicted to the "malefactor fire and water," which was the form of her sentence of banishment. Such banishment involved the forfeiture of all their estates, real as well as personal. While they allowed the malefactor to depart with life they reduced him to poverty. Such was the fate of Cicero when he went into exile. It was from the study of this Roman law, no doubt, that our learned President took the idea contained in his speech, "traitors must be impoverished." He will, I hope, pardon us for not being hard-hearted enough fully to carry out his wishes.

Certain gentlemen seem hard to learn, either from the writings of learned publicists, or from the passing and visible events of the present age. The German empire had many features similar to our own. It was composed of thirty-eight States, each independent in its own municipal government and laws, but each subject to the general government of the empire in whatever came within its jurisdiction. By its constitution all the States were pledged to perpetual union. This pledge had come down to them through ages. It had a congress of members from each of the States, which was sitting permanently, whose acts were to bind each member of the confederacy. War broke out between two of the principal Powers. The minor States ranged themselves under the banner of the one or the other. Prussia triumphed.

Did the constituent parts say, "We lay down our arms; peace ensues; and we claim our old rights as they were under the constitution of the German empire? We could not go out of that empire, for our constitution declared that it should be perpetual." No. None of the vanquished Powers were so idiotic as to set up such pretenses. No one was foolish enough to suggest it to the conqueror. Prussia took up these submissive States and dealt with them according to the universally-acknowledged laws of war. She first imposed the expenses of the war upon the conquered belligerents according to what she deemed equitable. Austria bore forty-five millions, Saxony ten millions, Bavaria three millions, and so on. She refused to let the States participate in the Government, but incorporated several of them into the kingdom of Prussia. Why do not these injured parties invoke the indignation of the civilized world? Because they knew that the verdict would be against them. They knew that the war destroyed the constitution of the German empire and annulled the treaties of 1815; that all must be subject to the will of the conqueror. Where is our statesmanship that we suffer the enemy to escape from the payment of the costs and damages of the war? Where is our patience that we suffer them to clamor about rights under the Constitution? Where is our courage that we suffer the President to head this new rebellion?

The remaining part of the sum levied, to wit, $200,000,000, is to remunerate loyal men in both sections who in consequence of their loyalty have been plundered and had their property destroyed by the invading armies and raiders of the enemy, or by the unjust seizure and confiscation of the property of loyal men in the rebel States. Who objects to this? Whoever does let him put his name on record, that the country may fairly judge on which side his sympathies lie. By the usages of nations the property of the citizens of the belligerent Power taken or destroyed as a military necessity is paid by the Government. But property taken or destroyed by the enemy is not paid by the Government. Strictly speaking, the property of citizens of the hostile Government, though friendly to the conqueror, cannot be charged to the victor. But in civil wars it seems to me that a distinction should be made, and those who had suffered for their adherence to the parent Government should be taken care of in adjusting the conditions of peace. We know there are loyal men in the South who are large sufferers. There are a still larger number in the North who are made larger sufferers, neither of whom have any chance of being remunerated except through this congressional legislation. Neither of them can ever receive a dollar out of the Treasury of the United States. I know not whether $200,000,000 will pay them. Certainly it would be a great relief. I need not enumerate the sort of damages to which I refer. Southern loyalists who have suffered are everywhere to be seen. The valley of Virginia and the course of Sheridan's operations are full of them. The smoking ruins of Lawrence and Chambersburg, almost every county of Missouri and Maryland, and the frontier portions of Ohio are samples of the latter.

If the war had been between two regular Governments, both of which survived the war, the victor in the treaty of peace would require the vanquished to pay all such damages as well as all the expenses of the war. If neither had conquered the other they would probably be silent, and each bear his own loss. Congress is dictating the terms of peace. If she does not provide for these meritorious claimants she will be bound in honor to pay them out of the national Treasury. If she does not, individuals will be wronged and the nation dishonored. This bill is very merciful toward a cruel, outlawed belligerent, who, when their armies were dispersed, would gladly have compromised if their lives were saved. Those who will be affected by this bill will not exceed seventy thousand out of a population of six million whites, for this is a people of aristocrats and subjects; of a proud nobility and a cringing, poor peasantry. Those seventy thousand persons own about three hundred and ninety million acres of land out of the five hundred millions in the confederate States. This, together with the town property, cannot be worth less than $10,000,000,000. This estimate includes no man's property who was worth less than $10,000; nor does it include any personal property, which may perhaps swell it to $12,000,000,000. The fine proposed would be but one twentieth of their estates. Were ever such great malefactors so gently dealt with? It were well if all their large estates could be subdivided and sold in small tracts. No people will ever be republican in spirit and practice where a few own immense manors and the masses are landless. Small independent landholders are the support and guardians of republican liberty.

But it is said that very many of these men have been pardoned by the President, and their forfeited estates restored to them.

I must take the liberty to deny that any pardon, or any other power vested in the President, can withdraw these forfeited estates from the confiscation decreed by Congress. Nothing less than an act of Congress can divest them from the United States and bestow them on the pardoned belligerents. No one denies that the President possesses the pardoning power. This power is conferred on the Chief Executive for wise purposes, to correct the errors and mistakes of courts, and imperfections of human laws. Bacon says:

"The power of pardoning offenses is inseparably incident to the Crown, and this high prerogative the king is intrusted with upon a special confidence that he will spare those only whose case, could it be foreseen, the law itself may be presumed willing to have excepted out of the general rules which the wisdom of man cannot possibly make so perfect as to suit every particular case." (6 Bac. Abr., 138.)

How well the President has adhered to the object of this high prerogative others must judge. The special pardons granted cannot indeed be over four thousand of the subjects of confiscation.

The pardons are granted for the crime of treason.

I shall not question that such pardons may be pleaded in bar of any prosecution for treason, and save the traitor's property from the forfeiture which results from the conviction of that crime.

But the act of July 17, 1862, under which these forfeitures arise, has no reference to treason, (except the first four sections, under which we do not ask the action of the Executive.) It declares the property of certain belligerents, enemies of the United States, subject to seizure, and orders it to be appropriated, as enemies' property, to the service of the United States Government. In perfecting the forfeiture it does not pretend to prosecute the owners for crime, but treats their property as that of any enemy who was captured as lawful prize. How can the President by a pardon restore the property thus vested in the United States? Suppose the delinquent were an alien enemy, and as such his property or land was ordered to be seized by act of Congress? Could the President dispense with that law by his sovereign power and arrest the forfeiture in its transit to the Treasury? The belligerent has been guilty of no crime as belligerent of which the Executive could absolve him. Neither the war-making power nor the power to make peace is in the President. The power to declare war is vested in Congress alone. The power to make peace rests with the President and the Senate. The power to dispose of the property of a conquered people is vested in the sovereign law-making power of the nation, which in this Republic is Congress. A king of England once claimed and exercised the right to dispense with an act of Parliament; but the Parliament vindicated its rights, and by an act (1 Ws., 111) declared all such pardons and charters void, and that no "dispensation by non obstante of or to any statute or any part thereof be allowed." Have we the courage and the virtue of our British ancestors?

But at the most the pardons extend to but fourteen thousand out of seventy thousand wealthy belligerents. While there is not the least pretense in law that the President, by pardon or otherwise, can wrest this property from the Government, yet it is melancholy that the Executive should confederate with traitors, and by his own act and on his own individual responsibility attempt to take billions out of the Treasury of the United States to enrich bloody traitors; to impose burdens on the loyal men who risked life and property to save the nation that fawning rebels might live in affluence and glorify him. But even if all those now pardoned were beyond our reach, there are still several thousands who are not shielded by these potential charters. That will suffice for the small sum which this bill requires.

While all must mourn over the melancholy spectacle of the attempted robbery of loyal men and the suffering relations of the martyrs of liberty by one who should be their guardian, let us deal fairly and place the responsibility where it justly belongs. Andrew Johnson before he was President held, as we have seen, the following language. In a speech already referred to, made in the summer of 1864, he said:

"Why all this carnage and devastation? It was that treason might be put down and traitors punished; therefore I say that traitors should take a back seat in the work of reconstruction. [No "restoration" then.] I say the traitor has ceased to be a citizen, and in joining the rebellion has become a public enemy. He forfeited his right to vote with loyal men when he renounced his citizenship and sought to destroy our Government. [Then there was no being in the Union and entitled to "equal rights."] Treason must be made odious, and traitors must be punished and impoverished. Their great plantations must be seized and divided into small farms, and sold to honest, industrious men. The day for protecting the lands and negroes of these authors of rebellion is past. It is high time it was. I have been most deeply pained at some things which have come under my observation. We get men in command who, under the influence of flattery, fawning, and caressing, grant protection to the traitor, while the poor Union man stands out in the cold, often unable to get a receipt or a voucher for his losses."

How well he describes men when they get in command, "who, under the influence of flattery, fawning, and caressing, grant protection to traitors, while loyal Union men stand out in the cold." For some time after he "got in command" he held the same honest language; but, unfortunately, he had inherited the prime minister, the chief bane of his predecessor, who, oily and adroit, gradually gained his confidence and misled his judgment. He boasts that the plan of the Administration is his plan, invented by him and carried on by him. This is doubtless true. It cannot be the President's plan, for it contradicts all his well-considered declarations; but in process of time he was beguiled. While he was "clothed and in his right mind" he uttered the thoughts and sentiments of a statesman; but Seward entered into him, and ever since they have both been running down steep places into the sea. Nor do I expect he will be cast out without "sore rending."

Without impeaching the motives of the President, it is the duty of Congress, in vindication of its proper rights and prerogatives, to declare that he has arrogated to himself powers and attempted to do and enforce acts for which he can find no warrant in the Constitution and laws of the nation. Invested as he is with the command of the Army and Navy, with all the executive powers of the different Departments, if he should be permitted to usurp still further powers, and take control of the States, and the organization of Congress, is there not danger that some future Executive, some ambitious Cæsar, will cross the Rubicon and march his legions upon the capital? While protecting the President in the exercise of all his legitimate duties, and in times of national peril making large allowance for patriotic acts of doubtful legality, great care should be taken that he does not draw to himself all the powers of Government and thus enable him to become a despot. This is one of the sacred duties of Congress, which if they fail to discharge they deserve the severest censure, for they betray a nation; nay more, they betray the cause of universal liberty. To maintain this position is difficult, and requires great fortitude and moral courage. How apt is poor human nature to yield to the smiles or the frowns of power. How difficult to determine to cast from you all chance of influence and patronage? How difficult to resist the temptations of office and emolument? And yet all this must be done, or this great people, instead of being free, will become the heritage of tyrants.

Ten States of this Union have cast off their allegiance, and by the common acknowledgment of all have forfeited all their rights under the Constitution. To become again legitimate States in the Union, so as to entitle them to equal rights with the other States, the Constitution requires the sanction of Congress. It matters not whether such power is attributed to the provision to admit new States or to the clause guarantying republican forms of government; in either case Congress is the only power authorized to act; so has the Supreme Court of the United States decided in Luther vs. Borden, and elsewhere. The law-making power providing for the case, the President's whole functions are to execute the laws. If the "confederate States of America" are a conquered Power, the President, as Commander-in-Chief, may hold them in military rule until the sovereign power of the nation declares by what laws they shall be governed. Sovereignty rests with the people and is exercised through their representatives in Congress. But the President has assumed not only the military control of those conquered States, but he has attempted to give the force of laws to his proclamations and decrees, whereby he has determined what acts shall entitle them to all the rights of States in the Union. He has imposed upon them forms of government without their consent and without the consent of Congress. He has allowed a small minority of their votes to register his constitutions, and, without submitting them to the ratification of the people, he has declared them legitimate organic laws and the States "reconstructed." He has imperiously required of Congress to treat them as equal in all their rights to the loyal States, without inquiring whether they are entitled to representation, and dogmatically informed them that their only power is "each House for itself to inquire into the qualification and election of members who present themselves and claim their seats." If his order is not obeyed he obstructs legislation and "forbids" Congress to pass laws in the absence of such members. What more could a king do but place the crown upon his head? The king of England, for one hundred and fifty years has not ventured to oppose his single will to the will of the nation, and veto a bill which had passed the Parliament of the realm. England has had her servile and timid Commons ready to register the edicts of the Crown; but for the last hundred years such a body would have been hurled from power and doomed to infamy by the English people and by history. We are now undergoing the test of courage and the integrity of a Republican Congress. How many may be craven none can tell. For who can judge of his own strength? History will record their names. Men now obscure may thus obtain the advantage of becoming famous.

But it is said that Mr. Johnson is but carrying out the policy of Mr. Lincoln. That, if true, would not justify his errors. But it is not true. In the midst of the war Mr. Lincoln had but little time or little occasion to examine into the question of reconstruction. Until the enemy was conquered everything was made subservient to that great object. Attempts to distract the "confederate" government were made by recognizing parts of her territory as loyal. Such was the case with small portions of Louisiana. The President encouraged them to assume the form of a State; but Congress never sanctioned it. The President by his message and proclamation of December, 1863, suggested a mode of reconstruction; but in it he distinctly disclaimed all right to control Congress in the matter, and declared that his suggestion of a plan did not exclude other plans. He said:

"For the same reason it may be proper to say that, whether members sent to Congress from any State shall be admitted to seats constitutionally, rests exclusively with the respective Houses, and not to any extent with the Executive."

He defines more carefully what he meant in this proclamation in a well-prepared speech delivered three days before his death, (11th of April, 1865.) He said:

"In this I have done just so much and no more than the public knows. In the annual message of December, 1863, and accompanying proclamation, I presented a plan of reconstruction (as the phrase goes) which I promised, if adopted by any State, should be acceptable to and sustained by the executive government of the nation. I distinctly stated that this was not the only plan which might possibly be acceptable; and I also distinctly protested that the Executive claimed no right to say when or whether members should be admitted to seats in Congress from such States."—National Intelligencer of April 12, 1865.

How different from our present Secretary of State!

That good man, who never willingly infringed upon the rights of any other department of the Government expressly accorded to Congress alone the power to declare "when or whether members should be admitted to their seats in Congress from such States." It is not to be denied that his anxiety for the admission of members from Louisiana—or rather from New Orleans and adjoining parishes—gave uneasiness to the country. The people had begun to fear that he was misled, and was about to fall into error. If he would have fallen into that course, it is well for his reputation that he did not live to execute it. From being the most popular, he would have left office the most unpopular man that ever occupied the executive chair. But that overruling Providence that so well guided him did not permit such a calamity to befall him. He allowed him to acquire a most enviable reputation, and then before there was a single spot upon it, "he sailed into the fiery sunset,"

Here, if there were anything in common but their station, what a temptation to draw a parallel. But it would be unprofitable; especially in this debate. For what we say at the graves of admired friends or statesmen or heroes is not biography. The stern pen of history will strip such eulogies of their meretricious ornaments. But there is no danger that the highest praise that the most devoted friends could bestow on him would ever be reversed by posterity. So solid was the material of which his whole character was formed that the more it is rubbed the brighter it will shine. Mr. Lincoln, also, was of humble origin, (and who is not that is formed of the coarse clay of humanity?) and earned his living by manual labor. But he had too good taste ever to boast of the accident of his birth, or to weary the public ear with the tautological recital of his mental employments. He rose to the Chief Magistracy of the great Republic by his sterling patriotism, sober habits, and modest worth. He was not thrown into power by any moral or political convulsion. His elevation was no accident, but the result of the cool judgment of a nation of freemen. No man ever assumed such vast responsibilities under such difficult circumstances, except, perhaps, William the Silent. How similar in their lives; how alike in deaths.

If there was danger, and I admit there was some apprehension that Mr. Lincoln would be beguiled by his chief adviser into a course which would have tarnished his well-earned fame, that good Guardian who had guided him so well kindly preserved him from that calamity. Death is terrible. Death in high places is still more lamentable; but every day is showing that there are things more terrible than death. It was better that his posthumous fame should be unspotted than that he should endure a few more years of trouble on earth. All must regret the manner of his death; yet, looking to futurity and to his own personal position, it may be considered happy. From the height of his glory he beheld the promised land, and was withdrawn from our sight. In the midst of the most exquisite enjoyment of his favorite relaxation he was instantaneously taken away without suffering one pang of death. Like the prophet of the Lord who knew not death, he was wrapt from earth to heaven along a track no less luminous than his who ascended in a chariot of fire with horses of fire. Would to God that some small portion of the mantle of our Elijah had fallen on his Elisha.

Previous to the conclusion of the preceding speech Mr. STEVENS's hour expired, but it was extended by unanimous consent.

Mr. CHANLER obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Unless the gentleman from New York desires to go on I will merely say if the House does not want to consider the bill now, I will move its further consideration shall be postponed until the second Tuesday of December next.

Mr. CHANLER. I yield for that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have the floor when its consideration is resumed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MUNGEN. May I respectfully ask the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] what he will do in view of the oath he has taken to support the Constitution of the United States, article one, section three, clause nine, which says that "no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed," if the honorable gentleman's peculiar ideas of right and wrong enable him to now enact a law in the face of the Constitution, which is clearly ex post facto, or in other words retroactive? In our country, and under our laws, the people are sovereign; and the very law introduced by the gentleman admits that there was no law violated. The rebels had but put to practical results the doctrine of the leaders on the other side of the House as to the right to secede.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. No lawyer will ever call this a bill of attainder. If the gentleman is a lawyer and has read the bill, I presume he has asked the question inadvertently. [Laughter.]

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 10) in relation to certain coin and bullion on special deposit in the Treasury; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had insisted on its disagreement to the second and third amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 38) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration; had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Messrs. TRUMBULL, WILSON, and BUCKALEW as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 38) in relation to the acknowledgment of deeds in the District of Columbia; and

An act (S. No. 39) to provide means for the prosecution of the work on the distributing reservoir of the Washington aqueduct.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 19) to clothe maimed and destitute soldiers.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions of the following titles without amendment:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 17) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to turn over certain property of the United States at Camp Chase, Ohio, for the use of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 20) to supply an omission in the enrollment of the act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes.

COLORADO CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. SCOFIELD gave notice to all the members interested in the contested-election case of Colorado that he would call it up to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal.

DESTITUTE IN THE SOUTH AND SOUTHWEST.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE moved that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 16, for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States.

Mr. BUTLER. I modify my amendment by substituting the following for it:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following in lieu thereof:

That the several district commanders of the military districts defined by an act entitled "An act to provide for a more efficient government for the rebel States," approved March 2, 1867, shall have power to assess and collect by military authority, ratably upon all persons within their districts respectively, owning more than one hundred and sixty acres of or who shall have an income of more than $600 a year, such sum or sums as such commander may deem necessary to relieve and provide for the destitution and pauperism of the people in his district, not within the provisions of the act concerning abandoned lands, refugees, and freedmen: Provided, That all moneys raised by such assessments shall be applied to the purposes of such relief and no other.

And be it further resolved, That for the purposes of collecting such assessments such commanders shall severally have, in addition to their military authority, the same powers and authority to levy and collect, by sale or otherwise, such assessments as was vested by law in the tax commissioners under an act entitled "An act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary States, and for other purposes," passed June 7, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof, so far as the same may be applicable, which power of levy, collection, and sale may be exercised by said district commanders severally, either in person or by a commissioner duly appointed by each of said military commanders, and all acts and proceedings in such assessment, levy, and collection shall be as valid to all intents and purposes as if done and carried on under and by virtue of the provisions of said last mentioned act.

And be it further resolved, That the sums as raised by assessment shall be distributed and applied for relief as aforesaid by the several district commanders respectively, either by such officers or military commissions as they may detail, or through the agents of the Bureau of Abandoned Lands, Refugees, and Freedmen of their several districts at his election, who shall be the agents of said district commander for this purpose, and said district commander shall cause a full, true, accurate, and explicit account to be kept, and return to be made, of his receipts and expenditures, and of his doings under and by virtue of this act, to the Secretary of War, who shall audit and adjust such accounts in the same manner as the accounts of the disbursing officers of the War Department are audited and adjusted.

And be it further resolved, That to meet the pressing exigencies of the wants of people of his district, the commander of each of said districts may require for, and receive from the Commissary General of Subsistence, such rations of food, from time to time, as he may deem sufficient to meet such exigencies and afford proper relief, to be distributed by him in the manner aforesaid, and said commander shall out of the sums so assessed and collected, as soon as may be, reimburse and pay the subsistence department for all the rations as required by him at the prime cost thereof, with a reasonable amount for transportation of the same: Provided, however, That no relief shall be given or afforded to any able-bodied unmarried man or to any family wherein an able-bodied inmate is residing who is not continuously employed in some manual labor during the time of giving such relief.

Mr. BUTLER. With the leave of the committee, I will withdraw the modification of the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move it as a substitute for the previous substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] And as this debate may go over, I ask that it may be printed.

The CHAIRMAN. That cannot be ordered in committee.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, in discussing this question I shall assume that there are thousands of our fellow-citizens within the lately rebellious States who are now, and for a few months to come will be, suffering for want of food. We have a report from the Christian soldier, General Howard, that such is the fact; and I may say that in private conversation with that gentleman he assured me of the necessity of material aid and the propriety of legislative action. I am told by my friend from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] that since it has been intimated that General Howard was not in favor of this appropriation he has received a letter from him, stating that no person is authorized to make such a declaration.

I will read a statement respecting the condition of the poor of the South from the New York Times:

"THE CRY OF ANGUISH.—We have neither money nor corn. Can and will you let me have fifty bushels till I can make a crop? I will surely pay you. I have fifteen freedmen hired and we can get no corn. If your Christian people could see our sufferings, I feel that the sympathetic tear would come to their eyes. Only think for a moment; last year we had eleven weeks and no rain. Our corn fell in the fields, and there is nothing but abject want before us."

"So writes Mr. H. Edmonds, of Ridgeway, Fairfield district, South Carolina, in a letter received yesterday by the Southern Famine Relief Commission of this city. His appeal comes with the indorsement of Rev. Richard Fuller, D.D., of Baltimore, to whom he is personally known. His letter represents a distress that reaches through nearly every district of South Carolina, and includes not fewer than a hundred thousand people. Planters have no seed to put into the ground and no bread to feed the laborers needed to prepare the ground for a crop. Whole families are known to have lived on corn husks for weeks."

"What is true of South Carolina is also true of large sections of middle and northern Georgia, and of more than half the counties of Alabama. Some sections of North Carolina and Mississippi are in the same condition, though not to the same extent. But it is believed, on the authority of much painstaking inquiry, that there are at least three hundred thousand people in the above States who must have relief from the benevolently disposed people of the North to prevent suffering which the heart shrinks from contemplating. The South is too deeply impoverished to feed her own starving population, and the bread and the seed must come from the North."

"The simultaneous appeal appointed to be made from all the pulpits throughout the country to-morrow should be responded to with a generosity that will give the Commission $100,000 to expend in its timely and benevolent work. Mr. James M. Brown, No. 61 Wall street, is the treasurer, and will see that the money is faithfully applied to the uses for which it is contributed."

Now, sir, such being their condition, I am in favor of the resolution. Sir, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] to which I am opposed, as I am also equally opposed to the substitute for the same offered this morning, was not, in my estimation, presented with the idea that it would meet the approval of the House, but rather with the intention of defeating the original measure. I for one do not like such legislative finessing. I prefer to meet a question upon its merits fairly and squarely. The gentleman well knew when he introduced the substitute that he was placing members of the House in a disagreeable if not in a false position. The constituency which we represent do not demand the passage of such a proposition. The people who are to be aided thereby do not demand it. It is unwise to vote for it, and by voting against it the gentleman well knows that we may subject ourselves to the calumnies of demagogues as being recreant to the interest and false to the necessities of those widows and orphans who have nothing left on earth but the fair fame of fathers and brothers who gave up their lives on the altar of their country. Sir, such a proposition partakes more of the arts of the politician than the high and manly purpose of the statesman.

I shall vote for the original resolution without fear that my constituents will blame me for a want of sympathy or generosity on the one hand, or for undue extravagance in the expenditure of the public money on the other. My sympathy for the heroic dead is as great as that of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The soldier's memory is as sacred to me as it is to him, and when the proper time comes I trust I shall not be far behind the honorable gentleman in relieving the necessities of their widows and orphans, both from my private purse and from the public chest. I say with him, God bless the noble soldiers who, through rivers of blood, have saved our beloved country, and borne our flag aloft so successfully that it now floats over every sea, the hope of the oppressed and the fear of the oppressor. God bless their widows and orphan children, and palsied be the hand and dumb the tongue that would not by act and word conduce to their comfort and support.

Sir, I am equally opposed to the proposition introduced this morning by the gentleman from Massachusetts as an additional substitute. As I gathered from the reading of it by the Clerk, it provides that the military commanders of the various districts may assess those owning over one hundred and sixty acres of land or having an income of more than $600 per annum to an amount sufficient to feed the starving poor of the South. It seems to me to be thrust forward as an easy, cheap, and I may say illegal method of effectuating the gentleman's Quixotic scheme of general confiscation. The scheme cannot be justified under the Constitution, or in the present condition of the country under the laws of war, or under that principle of sovereignty which is above the Constitution and enables every Government to do that which may be necessary in order to protect the national life.

When the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] was at New Orleans, where he so well and so faithfully and so gloriously served his country, he could under the laws of war take the property of the rebel citizen and apply it either to the preservation of the health of the city or the lives of the people. If the gentleman claims that the southern States are now under the exclusive and absolute control of Congress, and that his measure is in the nature of a tax, then it is illegal and unjust, because it is indefinite, unequal, and without apportionment. If he justifies it upon the doctrine of sovereignty superior to the Constitution, then it is illegal, unwise, and unjust, because it is partial in its operation, and to be applied without condemnation or any of the ordinary procedures of law.

I know it has been said upon the floor of this House, and more especially by gentlemen upon the other side, that the recent legislation of Congress providing for the more effective government of the rebellious States is unconstitutional; that it cannot be justified by the Constitution, or under the laws of war, because war is no longer existing, and hence is improper and cannot be sustained.

Passing over that clause of the Constitution which says that Congress shall guaranty to every State and the people thereof a republican form of government, I strike higher ground, and justify the law upon the doctrine of sovereignty, that inherent and necessary power which rests in every Government on earth. The decalogue, in which it is written by the finger of God, "Thou shalt not kill," is the law for the guidance of every individual soul. And yet who does not know that when a man is called upon to defend his own life that right is superior even to the divine command?

It is so with nations. Let me illustrate. When Napoleon I offered to cede the territory of Louisiana to the United States, President Jefferson was troubled because he could find no authority in the Constitution, or in the Federalist which expounded it, for making the purchase. He consulted his friend, an eminent lawyer, who told him that he had looked into the wrong book; that the constitutions of no nation in Christendom, written, verbal, or traditional, contained any such provision; that it was an attribute of sovereignty and belonged of right by the law of nations to every independent Government on earth, and the purchase was made under that sovereignty, which authorizes a Government to do that which its own preservation demands.

And so in the present case. The first and paramount duty of the Government is to protect its citizens in their persons and property. When it fails to do that its vital force is gone; it becomes a dead carcass, and is no longer a living power. Such being the case, it was within the power of Congress, by virtue of its sovereignty, to pass such regulations and ordain such measures as would give to every citizen in the southern States the protection which Government is under obligation to provide. When Government fails to give that protection, then it is absolutely destroyed. Now, this being the case, we had the right, in the exercise of sovereignty, to use all the means and forces which a Christian nation ever uses to preserve the life of the nation. We cannot justify the measure introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] upon that or any other tenable ground; and hence I am opposed to it.

The first, the coldest, and the most heartless objection made to the passage of the resolution is that the condition of the public Treasury will not justify its passage. Sir, when a house is on fire and a sweet child is at the window crying for help, and the chances are that it may be saved although danger might attend the attempt, shall the fireman hesitate until the flames envelope the child? When the drowning man is struggling in the wave shall the strong swimmer hesitate to save him lest, perchance, the exposure may increase his cold. Sir, should this great nation, burdened it is true with debt, burdened it is true with taxes, but boundless in its resources, exhaustless and immeasurable in its recuperative energies, fail to accord sustenance to thousands of its starving citizens? I have no patience with such reasoning. It belongs to the politician, and not to a statesman having in view his duty to his fellow-man and his responsibility to God.

Sir, the next objection is that if we grant this relief the money we appropriate will be bestowed upon enemies. What if it should be? Are they enemies at war? Do the cruel and bloody laws of war, which justify a nation in inflicting every injury in its power upon its enemy, now prevail? By no means. Peace has returned. We have turned from the long and bloody night of war to the sweet and dawning morn of peace, and amid the parting clouds the grand old arch has struck high in the heavens. If enemies at all, they are no longer enemies in war, and our divine Teacher says, "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirsts, give him drink." But, sir, these are not our enemies. They are the poor, downtrodden, oppressed whites of the South, whose condition formerly was but little removed from that of the slave, and who now, in their time of trouble and starvation, demand our sympathy and aid. Although the men were driven into the war, who will brand as an enemy the poor woman remaining at home and struggling for the sustenance of herself and children, even while her husband was fighting against our flag? Who shall say that the infant drawing a miserable sustenance from the half-starved mother's breast is an enemy of the country? And yet, sir, it is such as they that cry to us for help.

The next objection is that there is enough at the South to provide for all its people were it properly distributed. For the sake of the argument grant it. That it is not so distributed we all know. That the starving poor cannot control the matter is perfectly apparent.

The illustrations used by the gentleman from Massachusetts were addressed to the passions rather than the reason of the House. What if Mississippi has appropriated $20,000 to aid in the defense of that arch traitor, Jefferson Davis? What if the women of Texas have converted soldiers' clothing into money, and for the purpose of endowing an institution over which Robert E. Lee presides, or have sent a pair of game chickens for his private table? Do such facts change the question? Are the starving poor responsible? Not at all. As well might we say that the children of the unfortunate drunkard should be left to starve, because the father, if he were sober and industrious, would be able to support them.

Sir, these are the three objections which have been urged against the passage of the resolution; and certainly no one of them commends itself to my judgment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Will the gentleman give way a moment that I may send up and have read as a part of his speech a letter on this subject from the poet Whittier?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I presume it is better than anything I can say. I yield of course.

The Clerk read as follows:

A PEACE AND GOOD WILL LETTER FROM THE POET WHITTIER.

AMESBURY, 4th Third month, 1867.

MY DEAR FRIEND HASKELL: I have noticed with great satisfaction a movement in your city for the aid of the people of the South. Threatened as they are in many places with actual starvation, there can be no doubt of our duty to relieve them to the extent of our ability. This obligation is not affected by the question of their loyalty or disloyalty. They must be fed.

I am sure it will be done, and done cheerfully. Massachusetts, so fiercely denounced by the rebel press and hated with such blind ferocity by the great mass of the men and women of the late confederacy, has never entertained any feeling of hate toward the people of the South. She was forced sadly and reluctantly to put forth all her energies for the preservation of the Union and the suppression of armed rebellion. She made for this object terrible sacrifices of her best blood; her heart still aches with its bereavements, and the bitter memory of the cruel treatment of her sons; but now, when those so lately in armed conflict with her are actually suffering for lack of food, I think I know the good old Commonwealth well enough to promise that she will not stop to make nice discriminations, nor to take counsel of revenge, but will give liberally, "upbraiding not."

In the providence of God an opportunity is afforded us to overcome evil with good, to magnanimously overlook the insane hatred still manifested toward us; and, so far as any action of ours can do so, to convince the people of the South that while resolved, for their good as well as our own, that slavery and treason shall have no possibility of resurrection, we have only kindness and good will for themselves, and that our hearts and purses are open to aid them in recovering from the evils resulting from civil war and social changes.

May I trouble thee to hand the inclosed to the fund committee, and oblige thy friend,
JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment to have an extract from a paper read.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I decline to yield further.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN] for causing to be read an article from the sweetest of all our poets, John G. Whittier, a citizen of Massachusetts, and an early and earnest pioneer of the anti-slavery cause. It represents the true feelings of that noble old Commonwealth, which is a worthy representative of the grand old fathers who more than two centuries ago unfurled the flag of freedom upon the sacred rock of Plymouth. From that spot were disseminated those principles which were the key-notes of the Declaration of Independence, and upon which is raised our beautiful temple of liberty. In the language of another poet:

"Ay, call it holy ground,
The soil where first they trod,
They left unstained what there they found—
Freedom to worship God."

It also represents the feelings of the people of Vermont, a State born into the Union amid convulsions and difficulties which would have intimidated and awed men less brave and patriotic than her fathers were, and preserving a record so pure that she is called the star which never sets. Her people are already burdened with taxation, but are ready to endure more and suffer more when our flag is assailed or our people cry for bread. I have no fear for the little Green Mountain State; and believe, sir, that every man and woman within her borders would call their Representatives recreant to duty should they oppose the passage of this resolution.

The question simply is, shall we extend governmental aid to these starving millions? Great God, has it come to this, that the American Congress in this century of the Christian era shall close their ears to the cry of thousands of their starving fellow-men for bread, bread, when we have enough and to spare! When the people of Ireland were famishing Congress hastened to their aid and appropriated money and provided ships to carry food to the starving. Will we allow it now to be said that we are worse than infidels, and refuse to provide for our own? I know there is a vacant chair at almost every table, and broken hearts in almost every family at the loss of father, son, lover, or brother in this dreadful war. The starving soldier as he dragged his weary limbs from the fetid prisons of the South; the maimed soldier who goes upon crutches through the streets; the hundred battle-fields, rich with the sacred blood of our martyred heroes, cry out for vengeance, but there comes a voice from Heaven, saying: "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord."

The tears, the groans, the blood of our heroes are bottled, and in God's time will be poured in inexorable wrath upon the guilty heads who were the responsible instigators of the terrible and causeless rebellion. Already the incipient curse is upon them. Their land, once basking in the sunny smiles of prosperity and peace, is now ruined by the ravages of war. Their homes are desolate, their fields are at waste, their industries are destroyed, their wealth is scattered, and gaunt famine stalks their streets.

When altars were reared to the unknown God the conqueror dragged at his chariot wheels thousands of the conquered to become his slaves; but now that the true and living God has been revealed, and "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" has yielded to the sublime teachings of forgiveness and a heavenly charity, let us, by the passage of the resolution, show to the South and to the world that with malice toward none and with charity toward all, we will pursue the right.

Believing that the proposition is just, I shall vote for it, and hope it may receive the favorable consideration of the House. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I will detain the committee but a short time while I present the reasons I have for supporting the Senate resolution. What does the resolution propose to do? To empower the Secretary of War to issue supplies of food sufficient to prevent starvation and extreme want among all classes of people in those southern and southwestern States where a failure of the crops and other causes have occasioned wide-spread destitution. It appropriates $1,000,000 for that purpose, which sum is to be distributed under the direction of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

If it be true in point of fact that by reason of a failure of the crop and other causes any number of persons are in danger of starvation, then, sir, the simple statement of the proposition ought to be an argument sufficiently powerful and convincing to secure the passage of the resolution by this House without a dissenting voice. Wherein consists the evidence of this fact? It comes to us in the shape of an official report from the head of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands. The business of this House is generally digested and arranged by the various committees thereof. They investigate the matters presented to their consideration, and, after a careful examination of the testimony, present their views to the House in a report. In nearly every instance a report coming from persons in whom the House confide constitutes the basis of action for all who are not upon the committee. Now, sir, in this case, it is true, we are not acting upon a report of a committee of this House, but upon a report of the head of one of the most important bureaus in the Government; and from the high character of the person who presents the report we are bound to believe that there was sufficient evidence to justify him in making it. The operations of his bureau have been extended over that section of the country where the theater of war was, and he would necessarily, from personal observation and the observation of his subordinates, have more accurate information as to the condition of the people there than any other person. I am not prepared to say how long this bureau has been in operation, but it has been organized long enough to satisfy my mind that its head, if even a person of ordinary intelligence, could not fail to have correct knowledge as to the character, habits, wants, and condition of the people over whom his jurisdiction extends.

But, sir, this report comes from one in whom the loyal millions of the nation confide. Beside the experience which General Howard has had in the bureau over which he presides, and which entitles his opinions to great weight, his patriotism, his bravery exhibited in the shock of battle, and his high Christian character have won for him the admiration, esteem, and gratitude of his countrymen. I accept the report, therefore, as true, coming from an officer of experience, patriotism, and enlightened judgment. This report is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
WASHINGTON, March 8, 1867.

SIR: In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the United States I have the honor to report as follows:

From official sources, and confirmed by gentlemen from different sections of the South, my estimate is 52,662 whites and 24,238 colored people, making in all 76,900, who will need food from some source before the next crop can relieve them. The number of rations for all per month, 1,707,000. For five months, the probable time required, 8,535,000 rations, at twenty-five cents per ration, the estimated cost, will be $2,133,750. Of this sum an appropriation has already been made for the five months to the amount of $625,000, leaving an additional sum required of $1,508,750. This sum I deem sufficient to meet the extreme want occasioned by failure of the crop, and other causes referred to in the resolution of inquiry. The present appropriation is ample, provided the issues be confined to the classes named in the Freedmen's Bureau act; but the additional sum named will be required should the issue be extended as contemplated in the foregoing estimate.

The following table affords the detail of the estimate for the several States where want is reported to exist.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
O. O. HOWARD,
Major General, Commissioner Bureau of Refugees, &c.
Hon. B. F. WADE, President of the Senate.

Here, sir, is brought to our knowledge the frightful and appalling fact that nearly fifty-seven thousand human beings on the continent of North America, and within the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, are in danger of actual starvation. And what are the arguments advanced by those who would make us believe that we ought not meet this demand promptly and unhesitatingly? Why, sir, we are told that some of these people who will be benefited by this resolution were rebels; that they tried to destroy our Government; and all the animosities and resentments engendered by the war are aroused; and the fiercest passions of the heart are appealed to to prevent the Congress of the United States from doing a noble, generous, and praiseworthy act. Doubtless some who were rebels will be relieved by this bill; but I will not stop to ask myself the question, when a human being is in danger of starvation, what his past life has been, much less to scan closely all his acts and recall to memory those deeds which would tend to arouse in my heart anger, hatred, vengeance, and all that is wicked in human nature, when charity, love to our fellow-man, and all that is akin to the divine attributes should alone be invoked.

Among the noble works that the Christian people of this nation are engaged in is that of raising money and sending missionaries into heathen lands to feed, clothe, enlighten, civilize, and Christianize those people. And in the midst of this glorious work, so creditable to us, and which will redound to the enduring fame and honor of our nation, in the midst of all the civilizing and humanizing agencies that are now working out the amelioration of the condition of man, are we going to cast so dark a stain upon the honor of our country, and so huge a blot upon the civilization of the age, by placing it upon the record of this House that the Congress of the United States refused to give bread to nearly sixty thousand starving people who live under the same Government with us? Sir, there is no one who looks upon the crime of treason perpetrated by the leaders of the late rebellion with more horror than I do. I believe that the people of this country have not yet realized in all its fearful and frightful proportions the enormity of this monstrous crime of treason against the Government. But the people who are to be reached by this generous act, rebels though they may be, are of that class who were always to be pitied rather than condemned. I mean the deluded masses of the people, who, if left to themselves, would never have engaged in the work of rebellion, but were made the tools of their more artful and designing leaders. And now, when through executive clemency the leading traitors escape punishment, and the wealthy ones are pardoned and have their valuable estates restored to them, would it not be cruel indeed were we not to meet the demand for bread for the starving poor?

But it is urged that we should withhold this charity because the southern people are unwilling to contribute to alleviate the wants of their people, and because the Legislature of Mississippi have contributed $20,000 for the defense of Jefferson Davis. Suppose this be true, does it follow that because they do not do their duty that we should imitate their example? If they are determined to persist in their folly, which has brought such widespread destruction and devastation upon our country, must we necessarily be guilty of a gross act of inhumanity?

I concur with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] that this will prove a most powerful measure of reconstruction; that it will carry conviction to the minds of those heretofore deluded people that we are not disposed to deal with them in a spirit of harshness and vindictiveness. But whether it accomplishes this or not it matters not. I maintain that it is a high and solemn duty resting upon us to do this, and we should perform it regardless of other and minor considerations. But a short time since the civilized world applauded the munificent donation of the philanthropist, Mr. George Peabody, for the relief of the destitute poor of the South. If such an act is commendable in an individual, is it not equally so in a nation? If acts of disinterested benevolence and charity render the name of an individual immortal, would they not lend imperishable honor and renown to a nation? It will ever be remembered to the lasting credit of the United States that they have been prompt in meeting the demands made upon them for the suffering poor of other countries. Let us bear in mind, though, that while acts of national charity form the brightest part of a country's history, that national honor may be dimmed by acts of vindictiveness and barbarism.

Sir, among the acts of the four eventful years of civil war that will stand out conspicuously upon the page of history is that of General Grant, who, when the forces of Lee were driven from their strongholds at Petersburg and Richmond and were compelled to surrender to the resistless legions of the Republic, ordered rations to be dealt out to a beaten and vanquished foe. If amid the reverberations of the guns which had just ceased their work of death and carnage the commander of the Union armies could deal out rations to an armed but beaten adversary, cannot the Congress of the United States, now when war no longer exists and peace is fast spreading its halcyon wings over the nation, rise above the passions and prejudices that have been invoked here, and in the spirit of true Christian charity and benevolence extend this boon to a starving people?

Sir, while I hold a seat upon this floor I shall steadily resist any effort that may be made to reinstate in the high places of trust and power the rebels who sought to overthrow the Government, believing that it belongs to the loyal people of the country to settle and adjust the questions that have grown out of the war. But for the honor and reputation of the nation, for the preservation of her good name and fame among the nations of the earth, out of the respect that we have for the opinions of mankind, now and in the future, let it not be said that in this nineteenth century, in a land of school-books and Bibles, where intelligence is wide-spread, and charity and benevolence among the characteristics of her people, that the Representatives of a great, free, prosperous, and enlightened people would refuse to give bread to their starving countrymen. All the teachings of Christianity, as well as the promptings of humanity forbid it. I trust the resolution will pass.

Mr. DONNELLY. I desire to submit the following letter and accompanying extract from the New York Tribune, to be read by the Clerk. The Clerk read as follows:

39 PARK ROW, NEW YORK, March 15, 1867.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to invite your attention to the inclosed article which I wrote for the New York Tribune, and to express the hope that the House will adopt the joint resolution giving $1,000,000 for the relief of a fearfully afflicted people.

Very truly yours,
EDW. BRIGHT,
Corresponding Secretary of Southern Famine Relief Association.

Hon. I. DONNELLY, Washington, D. C.

THE NUMBER OF SUFFERERS IN THE SOUTH.

To the Editor of the Tribune:

Sir: Every philanthropic heart must feel grateful for what you have done in behalf of the famine-stricken people of the South; but I every day see the evidence that the severity and magnitude of their distress is most imperfectly appreciated by the people of the North. As one of the secretaries of the Southern Famine Relief Commission, I have had, by correspondence and personal conversation, some special opportunities for knowing the sweep and desolation of the famine that is felt in large sections of the southern States, and with your permission I will state what has been the result of my inquiries.

The destitution which now claims relief is not limited to the line of "Sherman's march." It is felt with the utmost rigor in counties north and south of the territory over which he passed. It is not a destitution produced by the rebellion so much as by the drought that made tens of thousands of acres planted in corn in Alabama, Georgia, and South Carolina as fruitless as a desert. The corn crop was blasted before it was two feet high, and many large fields did not produce a single ripened ear.

The chief sufferers by this destitution are not the persons who instigated and perpetuated the rebellion, but poor men and unoffending women and children, who had no agency in the conspiracy against the life of the Republic. Major General Scott, the district commander at Charleston, says that Government rations are now only issued to persons too old or too young to support themselves, including the sick and infirm in hospitals and asylums. Consequently there is fearful destitution among the colored people of South Carolina; and so there is also in Georgia and Alabama. Governor Jenkins says that the number of colored persons in Georgia who need immediate relief is thirty thousand.

The whole number of people in imminent need of relief in southern States is not fifty or sixty thousand but full three hundred thousand. Of these there are probably twenty-five thousand in Mississippi and North Carolina. Of Alabama, Hon. M. H. Cruikshank, commissioner for the destitute, and a man who has the confidence of more than one of our best major generals, says that there are not less than forty thousand persons in that State that will have to be fed by public charity until a crop is matured, and a larger number than this who will require partial relief. Of Georgia, Governor Jenkins says that sixty thousand of its white population and thirty thousand of its colored people greatly need relief. Governor Orr says that five hundred thousand bushels of corn is estimated to be the least that will supply the destitution of South Carolina, and those best qualified to judge put the number of the destitute at one hundred thousand persons.

These carefully made estimates exceed three hundred thousand people who must be wholly or partially relieved by charity for the next three or four months. If no more than ten dollars' worth of food be allowed to an individual, it will take $3,000,000 to supply the lack of food in the States to which I have referred.

Some of your readers may regard this as an incredible statement, but it is corroborated, I am sorry to say, by the very full correspondence and personal conversations I have had with southern men within the last seven weeks.

The fact is, the poverty of the South is extreme, and the destitution of food occasioned by the late drought is appalling; and if help is not given in the form of bread to eat and seed to plant and sow, the famine will not only be calamitous in its immediate results, but will also be perpetuated through another year.

I know that the Southern Famine Relief Commission (Mr. James M. Brown, No. 61 Wall street, treasurer,) is using every means within its reach to induce the people of these northern States to relieve the distress which has fallen upon the South. Much has been already done by it; but it needs thousand where it has received hundreds.

E. B.
NEW YORK, March 15, 1867.

Mr. FARNSWORTH obtained the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield to allow me to send a letter to the Chair to be read, which I have received since I have been in the House this morning?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will do so.

The Clerk read the following letter:

REPORTERS' GALLERY,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 15, 1867.

DEAR SIR: A gentleman just up from North Carolina informs me that in the city of Newbern, in that State, there are hundreds of blacks and whites almost starving. He also states that a subscription of $2,500 was raised there in a few days for Jeff. Davis, but not a cent has been raised for the benefit of any one else. A Yankee firm in business there, seeking to propitiate favor and custom, sent to the ladies in charge a twenty-dollar greenback as a contribution to the fund. It was returned with a haughty refusal to receive any contribution whatever from a Yankee source for such a "noble purpose;" and a suggestion that the donors might carry out their abolition principles by giving it to the "starving niggers who have no masters to care for them now."

General BUTLER.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Who wrote that letter?

The Clerk stated that there was no signature.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it in order to have anonymous letters read in the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order for any gentleman to have a letter read as a part of his speech.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to allow me to have read an extract from a southern paper published where the people are impoverished beyond comparison consequent upon the burning of Columbia by Wade Hampton.

The Clerk read a portion of the extract, as follows:

"The city of Washington is now, according to common rumor, a den of thieves and prostitutes." Men and women both sell their labor daily for gold."

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a question of order. I submit that it is not in order to read anything that is positively indecent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SPALDING. I believe the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] has the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yielded to the gentleman from Indiana to have a letter read from a South Carolina paper.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I would like to know when the hour of the gentleman from Illinois will expire.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. In about sixty minutes from the present time. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURR. I would inquire whether my colleague adopts as a portion of his remarks the communication a portion of which has just been read by the Clerk?

The CHAIRMAN. (having examined the paper.) The Chair sustains the point of order, that the communication is not decorous in its character.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will state that I know nothing of the character of the communication. I yielded to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILLIAMS] to offer it, and I now yield to him to make an explanation.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. As the Chair has intimated that the article which I sent to the Clerk's desk to be read was "not decorous" in its character, I desire to explain. It is an original editorial article of recent date (only the 9th of this present month) from a newspaper called the South Carolinian, published at Columbia, one of the places where the people are alleged to be suffering most from loss of their property and destitution. If "indecorous," it only shows therefore the more strongly the temper of these for whom aid is now solicited, and how little they appreciate such magnanimity or benevolence. Nothing could be more bitter, nothing more offensive, than the spirit which breathes through the whole article. This is the shape which the appeal to our charity takes in that quarter. The editor meets the benevolent intentions of the people of the North, and of their representatives here, by declarations published to the world denouncing this Congress of whom they ask aid as thieves and robbers. I submit, under these circumstances, that the communication is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be in order in South Carolina, but not here. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will detain the committee but a very few minutes. I am opposed to this resolution, not, I trust, because I am uncharitable or unmerciful. I believe that I am as ready to give according to the extent of my means as any other gentleman who advocates this measure on this floor for the relief of the destitute of this or any other country. And if facts are presented to the House to show that any number of people are actually suffering for bread I will stretch a point, and go as far as any gentleman in voting an appropriation from the Treasury of the United States. But, sir, that evidence is not presented in this case.

There is nothing but rumors and outside information from letter-writers to show that there is such suffering as is here represented. General Howard, in his report, does not pretend that there is actual suffering existing in the South for want of bread. But an estimate is made that before another crop can be gathered in the southern States it is probable somebody there will suffer. And it is upon that predicate that we are asked to vote a million of dollars out of the Treasury of the United States for those people, to be bestowed and distributed there just as one single gentleman may see fit. Now, so far as that gentleman is concerned, I have very great confidence in him, and the very highest respect for him; but I will not consent to vote $1,000,000 which have been wrung from the sweat and toil of my constituents to any portion of the people of the United States in this manner. This is an unheard-of precedent. Sir, how long ago is it that the Senate sent us a bill to relieve the suffering people of Portland who were left homeless and houseless after that terrible conflagration of last summer? The House refused to pass it, and very rightly, too. We have never appropriated in this manner one single cent from the Treasury of the United States for any portion of the people of the United States.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Will the gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I would ask the gentleman if the American Congress did not appropriate money to relieve the starving men and women of Ireland? And is not this the first instance in the history of this country where relief has been asked for our own people?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have said nothing in regard to Ireland.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Ireland has votes of which we are very much afraid, especially those of us who play that game.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I can say this; I never voted money either for Ireland or any other country to be distributed for any such purpose as this. It may be true that Congress voted money for Ireland; but my remark was that in the history of this Government we have never appropriated money in this manner for the poor of the United States or of any part of it. This is a new precedent, and if followed out to its logical consequence, the same principle which will justify the appropriation of $1,000,000 for the starving people of the South, would demand of Congress that we should hunt out the starving poor of every city of the United States and contribute to their relief.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the gentleman if he does not know that during the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, we appropriated between four and five million dollars for the express purpose of furnishing clothing and rations to the freedmen and refugees of the late insurrectionary States, and whether he did not vote for it?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have said nothing about that. It is very true that for the purpose of carrying on the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau, and for feeding and clothing the four million of heretofore slaves, whose shackles had just been struck from their limbs, and who were left destitute, we did appropriate money, and I will again vote to do so, if necessary. But we are now asked to appropriate money to feed and clothe their former masters and rebels.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman will please remember that the refugees never were slaves.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. We gave several million dollars to the Freedmen's Bureau for the freedmen and refugees, about two thirds of which has been appropriated to the disloyal whites of the South.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. And we are now asked to appropriate still another million dollars for the disloyal whites of the South.

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. BOYER. Does not the gentleman know that during the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress a joint resolution was passed appropriating clothing for the suffering inhabitants of Portland?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No money was appropriated.

Mr. BOYER. I ask the gentleman to allow that joint resolution to be read by the Clerk.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I cannot yield now to have anything read. I say that we have never, to my knowledge, appropriated a dollar of money for the destitute people of Portland. It is true we let them have some tents and clothing, and I believe we allowed them more time in which to pay their taxes. But we have appropriated no money for the people of Portland. My statement is correct. Does any gentleman deny it?

Mr. BOYER. Does the gentleman say that we appropriated nothing but tents for the people of Portland?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I say we appropriated no money. Does the gentleman deny that?

Mr. RANDALL. Let the resolution in relation to Portland be read.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not think that is necessary.

Mr. BOYER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether we did not also adopt a joint resolution remitting certain duties and taxes imposed upon the people of Portland?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Oh, yes; we gave them further time to pay their taxes; we gave them some tents and some clothing; but I say again—and the gentleman dare not deny it—we have never appropriated from the Treasury of the United States one dollar for any such purpose as this.

Mr. BOYER. The resolution now before the House does not propose an appropriation of money except as—

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I decline to yield further. I was about to say that the principle which enters into this bill, and which it is claimed demands that we shall appropriate this money for the destitute and suffering of the South, would demand that we should send committees to all the cities of the country to hunt out the poor and the suffering and supply their wants. If it is right in principle to supply in this way the wants of fifty or one hundred thousand people, scattered over the country, it must be equally right to supply the wants of one individual, and hence whenever any member of Congress has a constituent in destitute circumstances, with no prospect of bread until the next harvest, it becomes the duty of such member to introduce a bill to relieve that suffering constituent by taking money from the Treasury of the United States to furnish him with bread. I ask members of the Fortieth Congress whether they are prepared to establish a precedent of this kind? Do they think it would be wise to do so? For my part, I think it would be very unwise.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] said the other day that there were no suffering poor in the North; that in Ohio nobody was suffering from destitution. Why, sir, I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman will allow me to correct his statement. I said, and I repeat now, that there is not in the State of Ohio a human being suffering for bread for whom there does not exist at this moment ample provision by law; and there has not been a time within the last ten years when such has not been the case.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Oh, yes; there is the poor-house—

Mr. BINGHAM. There is more than the poor-house. The provision of our law is that the officers of the poor in the several townships shall in cases of destitution give immediate relief without regard to the poor-house.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, that is a very wise law.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is a wise law; and let us exhibit in our legislation similar wisdom and humanity.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is a very wise law indeed. Ohio had better send a copy of her law to South Carolina, so that the latter State may imitate so good an example.

It is true that we of the North do provide for our poor; and when we have not laws covering the case and making it the duty of some official to look after them and supply their wants, we have our charitable societies. Many of our poor are supported by charity. Why, sir, there is not a city in the United States that does not contain some suffering poor. There does not pass over our heads a winter during which some people in every northern city would not suffer for want of food and fuel but for the relief extended by private charity or by public officers and institutions. But, sir, it is not the duty of Congress to relieve such suffering by the appropriation of money raised by taxation, taxation which falls upon both the rich and the poor; for there is scarcely anything that we eat or wear that is not taxed. Almost everything consumed by the poor man in my district is taxed. Now, sir, shall we take a portion of the money raised by taxation, wrung from poor men, and distribute it among the poor of other sections of the country? No, sir, I cannot see the propriety of such a proposition; and I trust it will not receive the sanction of this House.

Mr. Chairman, I have said about all that I desire to say on this subject. I have sought to discuss it soberly and calmly, and in such a manner as to secure if possible reflection upon the question before it is voted upon.

I will now move that the committee rise.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Before the gentleman submits that motion, I desire to make a suggestion to him if he will allow me.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If I understand correctly the distinction which the gentleman has attempted to draw—I may not have comprehended his idea exactly—he takes the position that legislation appropriating clothing, tents, food, &c., and remitting taxes and duties, is not the same in principle as an appropriation of money from the Treasury to aid those who are in a suffering condition. I, for one, am unable to appreciate the distinction that the gentleman from Illinois attempts to draw, and I wish to know whether I understand him or not.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not understand that we remitted any taxes, but only that we postponed the collection of the taxes.

Mr. BOYER. I hope, then, that the gentleman will permit the Clerk to read the acts to which I refer.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman to allow that to be done so that the House may clearly understand this matter.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I yield for that purpose.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution to authorize the President to place at the disposal of the authorities of Portland, Maine, tents, camp and hospital furniture, and clothing, for the use of families rendered houseless by the late fire.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to place at the disposal, without charge, of the city authorities of Portland, Maine, such clothing condemned or ordered sold, and such surplus camp and garrison equipage, bedding, and hospital furniture, on hand, as can be spared by the Army, for the use of families rendered houseless and destitute by the recent conflagration; and that it shall be the duty of the quartermaster's department to deliver these articles at Portland, and to take the receipt for the same of the mayor of the said city, and properly dispose of them where no longer needed.

Approved July 14, 1866.

Joint resolution for the temporary relief of the sufferers by the late fire in Portland, in the State of Maine.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized to suspend the collection of such taxes as may have been assessed, or as may have accrued prior to the 5th day of July, 1866, in the first collection district of the State of Maine, against any person residing or doing business and owning property in that portion of the city of Portland recently destroyed by fire, and who, in the opinion of said Commissioner, has suffered material loss by such fire: Provided, That such suspension shall not be continued after the close of the next session of Congress.

Approved July 27, 1866.

An act for the relief of sufferers by fire at Portland.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That on all goods, wares, and merchandise which may be sent from places without the limits of the United States, as gratuitous contributions to the relief of sufferers by the fire which occurred at Portland, Maine, July 4 and 5, 1866, shall, when imported at the port of Portland, and consigned to the proper authority for distribution, be admitted free of duty.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed and paid, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, on all materials actually used in buildings erected on the ground burned over by said fire, a drawback of the import duties paid on the same: Provided, That said materials shall have been imported at the port of Portland during the term of one year from and after the said 5th day of July, 1866.

Approved July 27, 1866.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I now ask the gentleman and the House whether there really is any practical distinction between the joint resolutions which the Clerk has read and the joint resolution which is now pending before the House? I ask whether there is any distinction in fact or principle between loaning any property of the United States on account of the misfortune of the people, or the actual appropriation of money from the Treasury for the same identical purpose.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think I can see a wide distinction. In the case of the sufferers at Portland, we let them have tents and clothing lying about and for which the Government had no use. We allowed them to receive goods from abroad without the payment of import duty, and we also suspended the collection of taxes there for one year. In the South we have not collected taxes for six years. We have authorized ships to carry them provisions and other donations. We have done everything for the South which we ever did for the sufferers at Portland, and more, too. There is a wide distinction between loaning tents and clothing, and, if you please, making donations of surplus clothing on hand to the suffering and destitute, and paying money directly out of the Treasury of the United States. It is true, these tents and clothing did cost money at one time, but it is also true that they were things we had on hand for which the Government had no use.

There is a great distinction between the two things. We passed an act the other day authorizing the Secretary of War to distribute to the inmates of Soldiers' Homes one suit of clothing each every year. This was giving to the disabled soldiers clothing which the Government has on hand; but if my colleague had introduced a bill appropriating $100 in cash to each one of those men every year you would have seen the gentleman from Wisconsin jumping to his feet and making the point of order, because the bill made an appropriation, that it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Giving clothing is not appropriating any money. There is a distinction made in our rules, in the law, and in practice.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman will allow me, I concede that there is a distinction made between the appropriation of one thing and the other so far as our rules are concerned; but I must say that the gentleman has failed to satisfy me that there is any distinction in principle. And I wish to suggest to the gentleman if the distinction in his own mind is not really this: that in the one case the appropriation was for white folks and in the other it is for blacks?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not understand the gentleman's point. I believe a portion of these are whites; and the very thing which he calls an appropriation was not made for blacks.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Well, the gentleman got the other thing so mixed in his mind that I thought perhaps he was mixed on this. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My impression is that the mixing is on the other side of the House. [Laughter.] I suppose it will be quite in vain to attempt to satisfy the gentleman that there is a distinction in the two cases.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask my colleague a question. Is it not the fact that upon the discharge of nearly a million of soldiers at the end of the war there were on hand large quantities of clothing, camp and garrison equipage, part of which had been condemned, and the greater part of which was no longer serviceable for any purpose so far as the Army was concerned, and that out of that kind of property of the United States the relief was granted to the people of Portland?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My colleague is right in regard to that.

Mr. LOGAN. And is it not the fact that there is a distinction in regard to giving relief, if you apply individually? Is there not a difference between giving away a pair of partly worn-out pantaloons or boots and putting your hand in your pocket and buying a new pair to give away? [Laughter.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Practically I think there is.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman permit me to make a correction?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman from Illinois, taking the suggestion of some persons around him, said there had been an appropriation made by Congress for the relief of Ireland. I rise to correct that statement. There was never an appropriation made for the relief of Ireland by Congress. It did pass the Senate and was reported to the House of Representatives; but owing, I believe, to some difficulty which President Polk had as to its constitutionality, it was referred to a committee which I presume was unfriendly to the measure, and so it slept the sleep of death and never was passed. I trust, however, although I rose simply to correct this statement, which seemed to be taken for a fact, that we shall have no trouble of that sort in this case. There is no constitutional question here, and I trust we shall vote this relief to our brethren of the South with alacrity.

Mr. COVODE. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me a few words?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. COVODE. I feel impelled to make a few remarks upon this subject since it has got to be somewhat a question of conscience. In that view of the subject I want to call the attention of the House to a historical incident that is in some respects parallel to this. Gentlemen who have read the history of the Kings in the Old Testament will recollect that when the Assyrian army under Benhadad came up to overrun Samaria and destroy the people of God, the prophet of the Lord appeared unto King Ahab and told him to go out and fight, and promised that the enemy should be delivered into his hands, that it was His will they should be totally destroyed. The king hesitated and finally consulted King Jehoshaphat who suggested another course. But yet he concluded to go out and fight. So he went and organized battle for six days and on the seventh, when the battle closed one hundred thousand Assyrians lay dead on the field. The rest of the enemy fled to the city of Aphek and there the Lord smote the enemies of Israel again and a wall fell on them and killed twenty-seven thousand.

A great deal has been said here to-day by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] and my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOONTZ] with regard to vengeance belonging to the Lord, &c. I want to show how the Lord executed judgment in the olden time. The servants of Benhadad went to him where he was hid in an inner chamber and said that the kings of Israel were merciful men, and perhaps Ahab would spare his life. Now Benhadad had no more expectation of having his life spared than Jeff. Davis had when he was running in petticoats away from our cavalry. But when his servants told him this, Benhadad told them to go to King Ahab and see how that was; but how did they go? did they go as these men come up, demanding their rights and desire to control the Government? No; they put on sackcloth and ropes round their heads. They went, under flag of truce, probably, and said to Ahab, "We know thou art a merciful man; we ask thee to spare the life of our King Benhadad." That is just what these people in the South are saying now. Now, although it was the command of God that all the Assyrians should be destroyed, Ahab replied to these messengers—"Is my brother yet alive? Bring him to me." And they brought Benhadad, and Ahab stooped and took him by the hand and lifted him up into his chariot, and pardoned him and all his bloody crew.

The prophet of the Lord appeared to Ahab that night, and told him that inasmuch as he had not obeyed the command of the Lord, he should lose his own life, and all his sons should lose their lives. What did Benhadad, the unrepentant enemy do? He went back into Assyria and raised another army, and came up at the head of it against Israel again, for the purpose of destroying the life of the man who had pardoned him. He charged his soldiers that they should pay no attention to the common people of Israel, but destroy the life of King Ahab.

Mr. BARNES. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the actions of an ancient Assyrian king have nothing to do with the question now under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] is in order and will proceed.

Mr. COVODE. King Ahab, knowing that he had violated the command of the Lord, began to be fearful of wearing his kingly robes, and put them upon Jehoshaphat, while he himself slipped away in the ranks. They took after Jehoshaphat; he turned and said, I am not King Ahab; they ceased pursuing him, but an arrow accidentally shot struck him between the joints of the harness, and wounded him so that he died that evening. And not only was Ahab killed, but every son he had was destroyed because Ahab had not obeyed the command of the Lord.

Now, I ask gentlemen if they suppose the Lord is done with punishing the rebels of this country? They have not yet repented and acknowledged their sins; they only regret that they had not succeeded in their rebellion.

I approve of the substitute of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] which provides immediate relief from our commissary and paramount relief by taxing the wealthy rebels; and while I am willing to contribute myself, I am not willing to burden an over-taxed constituency for the purpose.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, according to order, had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly Senate joint resolution No. 16, for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States; and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the substitute offered by me in Committee of the Whole for Senate joint resolution No. 16, together with the amendment to my substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 19) declaring a bridge to be constructed over the Missouri river at or near the town of St. Charles, and a bridge to be constructed over the Mississippi river at or near the city of Louisiana, in the State of Missouri, and a bridge to be constructed over the Missouri river at or near Leavenworth, Kansas, to be legal structures and post roads; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] will not press that motion now. I desire to state that the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on what is known as the supplementary reconstruction bill have unanimously agreed upon a report. That report has already been adopted by the Senate, I understand, and it will come over here in a few minutes for our action. I hope the House will act upon that report before we adjourn to-day.

Mr. WOOD. I will withdraw for the present my motion to adjourn.

CLOTHING OF DESTITUTE SOLDIERS.

Mr. JUDD. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 19, to provide clothing for maimed and destitute soldiers. The amendment consists of but one word.

No objection was made.

The amendment of the Senate was to strike out the word "annually" in the second line of the bill.

Mr. JUDD. I move the amendment be concurred in.

The amendment was concurred in.

WAIT TALCOTT.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at the present time a bill to authorize the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to make certain credits to Wait Talcott.

The bill, which was read for information, provides that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be authorized, in settling the accounts of Wait Talcott, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Illinois, to credit him with the sum of $556 93, being the amount stolen from Richard A. Smith, deputy collector, on the night of February 17, 1865, by breaking open the safe wherein the said Smith had deposited that amount of money, collected as taxes for the Government.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have here a letter from the former Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I ask the Clerk to read it.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to reserve the right to object; but I am willing that the letter shall be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
WASHINGTON, June 21, 1865.

SIR: In reply to yours of 14th instant I have to say that the statements and certificates forwarded by Mr. R. A. Smith, one of your deputies, in support of an application for credit for moneys stolen from him, have been carefully examined, and I am fully convinced that the loss was not the result of any carelessness on his part, and that he should be reimbursed for the amount.

This office having no authority to make such reimbursement, the papers are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

JOSEPH J. LEWIS, Commissioner.

WAIT TALCOTT, Collector, &c., Rockford, Illinois.

Mr. ALLISON. I insist on my objection.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move, then, to suspend the rules in order to allow the introduction of the bill.

The motion was not agreed to.

TAXATION OF NATIONAL SECURITIES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That in any future system of funding our national securities, the right to tax for municipal and State purposes should be directly granted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object.

TRANSIT ACROSS THE ISTHMUS.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolutions; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire and report what measures have been taken by foreign Governments or capitalists to secure the control in the interest of rival nations of any of the routes or franchises for the transit across the Isthmus of Panama or Nicaragua, Honduras, or Tehuantepec, and to report what action, if any, it may be advisable for the Government of the United States to take to secure the interests of American commerce on such transit routes.

Resolved, That the committee be authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, and to take such measures as they may judge expedient and necessary to collect and submit the facts for the information of the Government and people of the United States.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the usual number of copies of these resolutions be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

STAMPED FRANKS.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of this House when appointed be instructed to report a bill declaring the use of stamped franks illegal.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the rules be suspended to allow the introduction of the resolution.

The motion was declared not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion was not agreed to.

PAYMENT OF ASSISTANT ASSESSORS.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution to authorize payment for the services of assistant assessors of internal revenue who have taken the oath prescribed by law.

The joint resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and required to allow and pay to assistant assessors of internal revenue, who have taken the oaths prescribed by law, the compensation allowed by law to such assistants for services actually rendered by them prior to the time of taking such oaths, upon the presentation of the necessary vouchers.

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I hope my colleague will allow me to make an explanation.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand it thoroughly.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 17) authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over certain property of the United States, at Camp Chase, Ohio, for the use of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 20) to supply an omission in the enrollment of the act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes.

MOUNT VERNON MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE asked unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution referring the claim of the Mount Vernon Manufacturing Company to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN objected.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE moved to suspend the rules for the purpose indicated.

The rules were not suspended.

CORRECTION IN POST ROUTE BILL.

Mr. COOK. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to change a certain post route in the State of Illinois. It is merely to correct an error which occurred in the post route bill.

There was no objection, and the bill was introduced, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the clerks of the several committees of this House, who were serving as such at the close of the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, be entitled severally to receive pay at the same rate as heretofore during the present session, or until their successors may be appointed.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will modify the resolution so as to read "shall receive" instead of "be entitled severally to receive;" and I move to suspend the rules in order that the resolution may come before the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 61.

So the rules were not suspended.

RESERVE OF GOLD.

Mr. MORRELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for a reserve of gold in the Treasury and national banks, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency when appointed.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred, as I think it should go to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MORRELL. I do not object to that reference, and I hope the bill will be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means when appointed, and ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

WILLIAM TOWNSEND.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of William Townsend; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SAMUEL SILVER.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill for the relief of Samuel Silver; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bills were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, for the purpose of referring them to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARD then moved that the bills be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on House bill No. 83, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration.

It further informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 77) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to reimburse the State of West Virginia for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and paying a military force to aid in suppressing the rebellion," approved June 21, 1866.

UNITED STATES COURTS FOR NEBRASKA.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Before submitting the report from the committee of conference, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 61, to provide for a district and circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, and for other purposes.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GOVERNMENT OF THE REBEL STATES.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, submitted the following privileged report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 83, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the House, and agree to the same.

That the House of Representatives recede from its third amendment to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with the following amendment: on page 5, line eleven, after the word "assembling," insert "and if it shall moreover appear to Congress that the election was one at which all the registered and qualified electors in the State had an opportunity to vote freely and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud, and if Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors in the State;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

JAMES F. WILSON,

S. S. MARSHALL,

GEORGE S. BOUTWELL,

Managers on the part of the House.

LYMAN TRUMBULL,

O. R. BUCKALEW,

HENRY WILSON,

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The second amendment, which the Senate by this report agrees to, is one which inserted in the third line of the fifth section the word "registered" before the word "electors," by which the clause was made to read "the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the registered electors."

The other amendment of the House from which the conferees on the part of the House agreed to recede is the one by which the words "cast at said election [at least one half all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification]" are stricken out. We agreed to recede from that amendment, so as to leave the section in that respect as the Senate passed it, with the addition of the amendment which has been read; so that it will now read as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the registered electors qualified as herein specified, cast at said election, [at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the questions of such ratification,] the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session, then immediately upon its next assembling; and if it shall moreover appear to Congress that the election was one at which all the registered and qualified electors in the State had an opportunity to vote freely and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud, and if the Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors in the State; and if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as therein provided.

The effect of the amendment is this: that after the ratification of the constitution by the vote of the electors, Congress shall have the power to determine whether that election was a fair one; whether it was conducted in such manner as that every person entitled to vote could have voted if he desired; that he was not kept away from the polls by intimidation or fraud; and in addition to that, that Congress shall also be satisfied that the constitution is one which meets the approval of a majority of all the electors of the State.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him by what process, what modus operandi, Congress is ever to determine whether these elections have been conducted in the manner prescribed?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman has had some experience in relation to that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. I have had too much—too much. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Probably the gentleman can answer the question from his own experience better than I can, for my answer would be only theoretical. If when the constitution shall be presented to Congress for approval a portion of the people of a State should represent that the election which has resulted in the alleged ratification of the constitution was unfair, that the voters were kept away from the polls by intimidation or by fraud, or were prevailed upon by fraudulent means to vote for the constitution when they intended to vote against it, or vice versa, then Congress, through its appropriate channel, a committee, perhaps, can examine into the facts the same as we do into the election of a member, and determine whether there has been fairness in conducting the election, whether the will of the majority of those who actually voted is expressed in the result, and whether those who were entitled to vote but did not vote were restrained or kept away from the polls by fear, intimidation, threats, or fraud.

Mr. BROOKS. I have no doubt my unfortunate countrymen of the South will be very much in the condition I was in during the Thirty-Ninth Congress. But I had and have this advantage over them; that as often as Congress turns me out just so often do the people send me back again by an increased majority. That is an advantage which under this bill the southern people will not have. What I have to say, and I think I have once before called the attention of the House to it, is that nothing is settled by this bill. No matter what the South may do, no matter what compliance they may make with the requirements of the law, the whole thing is to be a contested-election case upon the floor of this House, with an opposition of more than two thirds of the members to control the result.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. When this bill shall have become a law, Congress will have proposed a complete plan of reconstruction for the people of the South; and by the amendment embraced in the report of the committee of conference it is proposed to give notice to the people of the South that their action under this legislation must be fair; that every man entitled to vote must have a chance to vote without restraint and in the absence of fraud; that unless that is done we hold in our hands the power to send the case back to them until they shall comply with the law.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] whether the effect of this surrender on the part of the House is not merely to substitute inferior evidence for that which is higher and may be called demonstrative in its character? In other words, whether we are not to take the opinion of Congress instead of the evidence furnished by the record of the votes?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We are to have the opinion of Congress upon whatever evidence may be presented, whether record or otherwise. And the judgment of Congress will be expressed by the votes of the two Houses.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Undoubtedly.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. When this bill went to the committee of conference it required a majority of the registered voters. When it comes back here from the committee of conference it requires only a majority of those who voted, no matter how few they may be.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It must be a majority of the qualified electors.

Mr. MARSHALL. As I have agreed to the report of the conference committee, it may be proper for me to make a brief statement in order to avoid misunderstanding and misrepresentation. It is well understood that I do not agree to the theory of the majority of this House in regard to reconstructing or restoring the southern States to their proper relations. The conference committee had imposed upon them the simple duty of seeing to the details of this bill. As I understand it, the majority of the House have agreed upon their plan of restoration, at least to the extent of this bill. And as a member of the committee of conference my duty was to look to the details of the bill.

Now, I much prefer the plan proposed by the committee of conference to the one adopted by the House, and upon which the disagreeing votes of the two Houses took place. It seemed to me that the plan adopted by the House put into the hands of the majority here the power to entirely defeat restoration under the plan now proposed by Congress. The vote on the ratification of the constitution by the people is to be taken months and possibly a year after the registry is made. Under the plan adopted by the House the result would be this: all who might die between the time of registration and the time of voting would be counted against the ratification of the constitution; all who should move from their district after registration would be so counted; all who should remain at home on the day for voting on account of sickness, or from business, or for any other of the many causes which keep men away from the polls, would be counted against the constitution, and although there might be in fact a very clear majority of the qualified voters, as prescribed by the law to which this is supplementary, in favor of the constitution, yet under the plan of the House as originally passed here it might be rejected, unless Congress disregarded the act which is now about to be passed.

Now, the difference between that plan and the one agreed upon by the committee of conference is very manifest. But if a majority of this House are in favor of the restoration of the southern States on any plan whatever, and are not merely paltering with this question for the purpose of keeping these southern States entirely out of the Union for an indefinite period, it seems to me that the plan now proposed is altogether preferable to that originally passed by the House, and it is with this view, and in regard alone to settling the details of the bill already agreed upon by the House, that I have given my consent to the report of the conference; not that I have yielded any of my opposition to the plan proposed by the majority of this House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the report of the committee of conference be laid on the table; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The report if laid on the table will carry the bill with it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 26, nays 101, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barnes, Boyer, Brooks,

Burr, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Humphrey, Kerr, Marshall, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Taber, Van Auker, and Wood—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Calk, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Briggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Perry, Fields, Gravelly, Halsey, Hamilton, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Lafin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, Marvin, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pile, Polsley, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Taft, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Union, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—101.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Benjamin, Bromwell, Chanler, Dawes, Denison, Eliot, Finney, Garfield, Griswold, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hulburt, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, McCarthy, McCullough, Moorhead, Morgan, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Poland, Pomroy, Price, Raum, Selye, Sitgreaves, Smith, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Taylor, Van Trump, and William B. Washburn—36.

So the report was not laid on the table.

The question recurred on agreeing to the report.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. PILE, (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. BEAMAN: The proceedings of a meeting of the citizens of Atlanta, Georgia, and also the petition of Volney Spaulding and 172 others, citizens of the State of Georgia, praying that the branch mint at Dahlonega be transferred to and located at Atlanta, and also for uniting with the branch mint building rooms properly arranged for the United States court, post office, and revenue offices.

By Mr. HALSEY: The memorial of the representatives of Thomas W. Harvey, deceased, for extension of his patents for manufacturing wood-screws.

By Mr. SPALDING: The petition of Francisco Bernandox, of Honduras, for a special act of naturalization in his behalf.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 20, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of women of Ohio, praying that they may be allowed the elective franchise; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of John Haerberle, praying that an American register may be granted to the schooner C. W. Chapin; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARLAN presented two memorials of citizens of the District of Columbia, complaining of the condition of the turnpike road between Washington and Bladensburg, and praying that measures be instituted to compel the proprietors of the road to comply with their charter; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of Clarissa Britain, administratrix of the estate of Calvin Britain, deceased, praying payment of a balance due Calvin Britain as agent of the United States at St. Joseph's harbor, in Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition of citizens of Florida, in which they set forth the evils to which they are exposed from the existing State government, and they entreat the action of Congress in such a way as to place their State government in the hands of truly loyal men. As that subject has already been acted on I move that this petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. YATES, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 11) to admit the State of Colorado into the Union, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) directing the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the execution of the law passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny, reported it without amendment.

LONG ISLAND, BOSTON HARBOR.

Mr. HOWARD. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 63) to authorize the entry and occupation of a portion of Long Island, Boston harbor, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to take possession of that portion of Long Island, in Boston harbor, Massachusetts, belonging to James T. Austin, for the purpose of erecting thereon a fort and such other structures as may be needed for military purposes; and to direct the payment of $5,000 for that purpose, according to the agreement between the agent and representative of James T. Austin and the United States.

The amendment was to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That said amount shall not be paid until the Attorney General of the United States shall be satisfied that the title of said portion of said island has been fully transferred to the United States free from all incumbrance, and that the person receiving the money is competent to act in the premises.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

DIPLOMATIC COSTUME.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations have directed me to report a joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 39) concerning the uniform of persons in the diplomatic service of the United States was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to hear that resolution read at length.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That all persons in the diplomatic service of the United States are prohibited from wearing any uniform or official costume not previously authorized by Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. Perhaps the Senate may be disposed to act on the resolution now. It is reported from the committee unanimously. I do not wish to press it if there be objection; but it is a proposition which explains itself.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to have some statement made concerning what uniform Congress has authorized or is likely to authorize. We have been already informed that the uniform of our ministers varies; that some of our ministers appear in the garb worn by generals in our service; that in other cases they conform to the garbs worn at the different Courts where they are, and that in other instances our ministers wear common citizen's dress. Now, I should like to have an explanation from the chairman of the committee as to what this resolution proposes and is to do.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to hear the resolution read.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the resolution be read, and that will be an answer to the Senator from California.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. CONNESS. That does not answer me. I do not see that that means anything.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see what right we have to prevent a minister abroad from wearing the uniform of our Army if he chooses.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator is aware that there is an existing habit among our ministers in Europe of wearing uniforms of other countries in the nature of Court costumes, and this is often required before they are presented. The Committee on Foreign Relations, on considering the subject, have unanimously come to the conclusion that it is expedient to prohibit the wearing of any such uniform or official costume unless it shall be sanctioned previously by act of Congress. We feel that our ministers abroad should not be required by any Government to which they are addressed to wear a uniform or costume unknown to our own laws. This is very simple, and, I submit, not unreasonable.

This question is, perhaps, more important than it appears. On its face it is of form only, or rather it is of dress. But I am not sure that it does not concern the character of the Republic. Shall our ministers abroad be required to assume a uniform unknown to our laws? The ministers of other countries appear at the Courts where they are presented in the very dress which they would wear before their sovereigns at home. What is good enough for their own sovereigns is, I understand, good enough for other sovereigns. And surely the dress in which one of our ministers might appear before the President of the United States ought to be sufficient anywhere. Its simplicity is to my mind no argument against it.

It has been sometimes said, gravely enough, that if our ministers appear in the simple dress of a citizen, according to the requirement of Mr. Marcy's famous dispatch, they may be mistaken for "upper servants." If this be the case they will have very little of the stamp of fitness. I am not troubled on this head. Their simplicity would be a distinction, and it would be typical of the republican Government which they represent. Amidst the brilliant dresses and fantastic uniforms of European Courts a simple dress would be most suggestive.

This is an old subject, which I trust may be disposed of at last. Mr. Marcy enjoined simplicity in the official dress of our foreign representatives, and dwelt with pride on the well-known example of Dr. Franklin. But his instructions were not sufficiently explicit, and they were allowed to die out. Some of our ministers appeared in a black coat, and were not mistaken for "upper servants." But gold lace at last carried the day, and our ministers now follow the prevailing usage of European Courts. A simple prohibition by Congress will put an end to this petty complication and make it easy for our ministers to follow abroad the simple ways to which they have been accustomed at home.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I wish to know is whether General Dix or any other minister could wear the uniform of our Army if he chose. The rule, if I understand it, in some foreign countries, is that a person must appear at Court in some kind of uniform. If none is provided by his Government or authorized by his Government then he adopts a certain uniform according to the custom of the country to which he is accredited. Perhaps, however, I am not correct.

Mr. SUMNER. The object of this joint resolution is to encounter that precise requirement of foreign Governments, and to put our ministers on an equality with those of other Governments. I have already said that ministers of other countries may appear at the Courts to which they are addressed in the uniform or costume in which they may appear before their own sovereign. I take it the Turkish minister is not obliged to assume in Paris or London any official costume peculiar to France or England; but he appears as he would appear before his own sovereign. Now, it seems fit that an American minister should enjoy the same equality with the Turkish minister or the minister of any other Power. I do not see how this can be accomplished unless he appears before the sovereign of the country to which he is accredited as he would before the Chief Magistrate of the American people—in other words, in the simple dress of an American citizen. This is the whole case in a nut-shell.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator does not yet answer my question: will this prevent an American minister abroad from wearing the uniform of an officer of the Army of the United States, such as he would be entitled to wear under our laws if here?

Mr. SUMNER. If he would be entitled under our laws there would be no difficulty.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have a law which authorizes a volunteer officer who has attained the rank of a brigadier general, for instance, always on state occasions to wear that uniform.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I think he might wear that.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not see what this resolution does.

Mr. SUMNER. It simply prohibits what is now done by certain ministers in Europe.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was not at the meeting of the Committee on Foreign Relations to-day because of my engagements elsewhere; but I submit to my friend, the chairman of the committee, that the language of this resolution would prevent a minister from wearing a military uniform known to the United States. It says "any uniform." It would compel him to appear in plain dress. If that is the purpose of the committee, it had better be stated expressly, I think.

Mr. SUMNER. I think there need be no objection to it on that ground.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know. The words are very comprehensive: he is not to wear "any uniform." Certainly our uniform is a uniform. I think my friend had better, perhaps, correct the phraseology of the resolution if he does not propose to prohibit the use by our ministers of our military uniform.

Mr. CONNESS. If it was stated in the resolution that our ministers were prohibited from wearing any uniform, but required to appear in citizens' dress, then we could understand it, and they would understand it; and if it should be amended in that way we should have a chance to vote for it understandingly, if we approved of it. As it is, I do not see that the resolution does anything but provide a rule to be understood.

Mr. SUMNER. I think there can be no misunderstanding. The ministers are simply to follow Congress; and as Congress has not authorized any uniform or official costume, they can have none unless they come within the exceptional case to which Senators have alluded. Certain persons who have been in the military service are authorized, under existing acts of Congress, to wear their military uniform on public occasions. Of course this resolution cannot interfere in any respect with that provision. It leaves the act of Congress under which they are allowed to wear a uniform in full force. It is only applicable to those cases to which no act of Congress is applicable.

Mr. CONNESS. Then why not plainly state that our ministers are forbidden to appear at foreign Courts in any other than citizens' dress; except in cases where they are authorized to wear the uniform of an American military officer according to the rank they have held in the Army? Then we should understand it.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the resolution provides substantially this very thing. There is no difference between the Senator and myself in our desires.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 33) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 19) to clothe the maimed and destitute soldiers.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 74) to change a certain post route in the State of Illinois; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 17) authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over certain property of the United States at Camp Chase, Ohio, for the use of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 20) to supply an omission in the enrollment of the act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 19) to clothe the maimed and destitute soldiers; and

A bill (H. R. No. 33) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration.

ORLEF E. DREUTZER.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Orlef E. Dreutzer, praying to be allowed $337 47 in coin, less the amount of fees received by him for services rendered as consul of the United States at Bergen, in Norway, from November 4, 1865, to May 24, 1866, have directed me to report a bill directing payment of that sum, and as I presume there can be no objection to it, the committee having thoroughly investigated the case, I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 89) for the relief of Orlef E. Dreutzer, late consul of the United States to the kingdom of Norway, was read three times, and passed.

EXPENSES UNDER RECONSTRUCTION BILL.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 7) providing for the expenses of carrying into full effect an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage; and as it is deemed very important to pass it at once, and it will take no time, I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to appropriate sufficient money, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of carrying into full effect in all its parts an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, with all its supplementary acts; but the amount is not to exceed $500,000.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 90) granting lands to each of the several States for the support of universities for females; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 91) to complete the title of the heirs of Baca; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 92) providing for a change of the time of electing a mayor and other officers for the city of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FOWLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 93) to authorize the retirement of Major General Ethan Allen Hitchcock; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 74) to change a certain post route in the State of Illinois was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

ATLANTIC DOCK WAREHOUSES.

Mr. MORGAN. I reported yesterday morning from the Committee on Finance a bill authorizing the sale of the Government warehouses on the Atlantic dock, Brooklyn, and I move that it be now taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 80) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the Government warehouses on Atlantic dock, Brooklyn, New York, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to sell the property on Atlantic dock, Brooklyn, New York, being warehouses numbers fifty-four, fifty-six, and fifty-eight, now owned by the Government, the sale to be made at public auction to the highest and best bidder therefor, in ready money, after giving notice thereof six weeks in succession in two daily papers printed in the city of New York.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, requested the return to the House of the bill (S. No. 60) to change the name of the steamer Paonshun.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW TRUST FUNDS.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to take up the joint resolution (S. R. No. 18) for the sale of certain stock, held in trust for the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians. It was laid aside temporarily the other day at the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] I wish to move an amendment that I think will make it satisfactory to him, and have it passed.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to add to the resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That no such stocks shall be sold, and no money shall be paid on such claims, unless the Secretary of the Interior shall have first examined and ratified or approved the awards made by commissioners, as stipulated in the forty-ninth and fiftieth articles of said treaty: And provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as recommending for his approval any awards already made under said treaty.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am unable to understand the amendment without hearing the resolution read. I therefore ask that it be read in connection with the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The resolution, if amended as proposed, will read as follows:

Be it resolved, &c. That to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the claims of certain Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, and other loyal persons, as are provided for in the forty-ninth and fiftieth articles of treaty concluded with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, on the 28th of April, 1866, the said Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to sell such of the stocks held by the United States in trust for the benefit of those Indians as he may deem expedient and proper; but no further sale of said stocks shall be made than may be necessary to pay said claims: Provided, That no such stocks shall be sold, and no money shall be paid on such claims, unless the Secretary of the Interior shall have first examined and ratified or approved the awards made by commissioners, as stipulated in the forty-ninth and fiftieth articles of said treaty: And provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as recommending for his approval any awards already made under said treaty.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the chairman of the committee to state the circumstances connected with this case. I am told there is a large amount involved.

Mr. HENDERSON. I stated the facts the day before yesterday when the Senator was not here. I called up the resolution, and something was said by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] about the effect; that it was very impolitic to pass it, and I thought an impression was left on the Senate by the remarks of the Senator that perhaps there was an effort to get through a measure that was inexpedient and improper within itself. I of course did not stop to explain it at the time, the Senate was busy. We have now but little time to consider measures of this importance. I really had no desire about it and no feeling about it; and when the measure came before the committee I felt that it ought to be guarded, and very carefully guarded. I saw the necessity for the passage of the measure in a certain contingency, and that is the confirmation by the Secretary of the Interior of the awards that have been made under the treaty of 1866, and over that officer we have no control in the premises; but in the contingency of his confirming the awards, of course there must be some provision made for their payment.

This case arises from the troubles among the Choctaws and Chickasaws growing out of the recent rebellion. There was a division in the tribes, and the disloyal portion being a majority drove the loyal Indians out. They went to Kansas, and their property was confiscated by their government at home, and their property was otherwise seized upon by individuals belonging to the tribes. When the treaty was made in 1866 the forty-ninth article of it provided that a commission should be appointed by the President to take an account of the damages sustained by these loyal Indians who had been driven out from among the Choctaws and Chickasaws. That commission has been appointed since the ratification of the treaty, and has reported damages sustained by these Indians to the amount of somewhere in the neighborhood of three hundred thousand dollars. The fiftieth article provides that certain Indian traders and individuals there mentioned by name whose property was seized should also be indemnified, but the amount was not to exceed fifty or sixty thousand dollars, I forget which. The commission on that subject has also estimated the damages, and that report is now before the Secretary of the Interior. I will read from the treaty of 1866. The forty-ninth article is:

"And it is further agreed that a commission, to consist of a person or persons to be appointed by the President of the United States, shall be appointed immediately on the ratification of this treaty, who shall take into consideration and determine the claim of such Choctaws and Chickasaws as allege that they have been driven during the late rebellion from their homes in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations on account of their adhesion to the United States, for damages, with power to make such award as may be consistent with equity and good conscience, taking into view all circumstances, whose report, when ratified by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be final, and authorize the payment of the amount from any moneys of said nations in the hands of the United States as the said commission may award."

The fiftieth article provided:

"Whereas Joseph G. Heald and Reuben Wright, of Massachusetts, were licensed traders in the Choctaw country at the commencement of the rebellion, and claim to have sustained large losses on account of said rebellion by the use of their property by said nation, and that large sums of money are due them for goods and property taken or sold to the members of said nation and money advanced to said nation; and whereas other loyal citizens of the United States may have just claims of the same character"— provision was made for a commission to examine and allow the claims. There was no limitation on the amount to be allowed under the forty-ninth article; and I understand, as I have stated, that the report under that article is in the neighborhood of three hundred thousand dollars; and the report under the fiftieth article is up to the limitation. Now, there are no moneys in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior belonging to these Indians with which to pay these claims. The Senate will observe that the treaty authorizes the payment of the amount from any moneys of said nations in the hands of the United States, as the commission may award. There are no moneys of theirs now on hand, but there are these stocks.

I was asked by the Senator from Indiana to explain what the stocks were; and since that time I have ascertained the amount and the character of the stocks, and I shall submit the statement to the Senate, and it is for the Senate to determine whether they will put any of these stocks in the market or not. I called upon the Secretary of the Interior before the committee acted on this question and asked him if he had ratified the reports. He informed me that he had not done so; that he had not yet had time to examine them. The disloyal Choctaws and Chickasaws, as it is charged, are urging that the claims be not allowed, that is, that the reports be not confirmed. A citizen of the State of the Senator from Maryland, I believe, is attorney for the nations, and he has resisted the ratification of the report in a very able argument and brief filed, which I had the pleasure of looking over, and in which perhaps there are some facts that would go against the ratification of the reports. Perhaps they are strong enough, in the estimation of the Secretary, to prevent the ratification; I do not know. He tells me that he has not yet examined them, and will not ratify them without a very careful examination; but if he should ratify the reports there is no money in his hands to pay the claims. I understand that these Indians are suffering, and that they need the amount of which they have been robbed. On the other hand, it is alleged that they have proved forty times as much as they ever lost. I do not know the truth of these statements, and it is entirely beyond our jurisdiction. If the Secretary ratifies the reports the money will have to be paid some time or other, and the only funds the Indians now have out of which to pay it are not in money, but in bonds.

The Chickasaws have $17,000 of Illinois State bonds, $90,000 of Arkansas bonds, $141,000 of Indiana bonds, issue of 1857, $14,599 of Maryland bonds, $512,000 bonds of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company, $100,000 bonds of the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company, $170,666 bonds of the State of Tennessee, $172,741 United States bonds due January and July, 1868, $165,000 United States bonds, due in 1882 and 1885. The securities held in trust for the Choctaw nation are $2,000 Missouri bonds, $450,000 Virginia bonds, and $2,000 United States bonds; and the Choctaw school fund consists of $19,000 Missouri bonds, and $102,000 United States bonds.

It will be observed that some of these bonds ought not to be put into the market at present. The remark of the Senator from Indiana the other day may have led the Senate to suppose that we were undertaking to rob the Indians of their annuities. It is no such thing; this resolution does not undertake to do anything of that sort. I will state further that it was examined in a full committee, and they know exactly what they have reported. The interest on the bonds of Indiana has not been paid for some years; and if those bonds were put in the market now they would be sold for little or nothing. Probably they ought not to be put in the public market for sale until the State of Indiana, as she designs to do very soon, shall have made provision for their payment, which will appreciate them in the market. I apprehend that was all that the Senator from Indiana meant by his suggestion. Then the bonds of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company, held for the Chickasaw Indians, ought not to be put in the market, because they, too, have paid no interest for some years. The Richmond and Danville Railroad Company bonds ought not to be sold, for they are in the same condition.

Mr. POMEROY. I have an amendment to propose to guard all those cases.

Mr. HENDERSON. The bonds of the State of Tennessee are in the same condition. No interest has been paid since the beginning of the rebellion. They amount to $170,000. They ought not to be sold, nor ought the bonds of the State of Missouri to be sold. It appears, therefore, that there are but the $172,000 and $165,000 of United States bonds that could be safely sold at present of the Chickasaw funds. It will be observed that the Choctaw Indians have no United States bonds except $2,000. The Senate may, therefore, very properly say at present that it would be improper to sell any of them.

I have stated the facts to the Senate, and they know them as well as the committee. All I have done in regard to this matter is to provide in the amendment of the committee that no legislation on the part of Congress shall indicate to the Secretary of the Interior that he ought to affirm these reports. I know of nothing else out of which the claims can be paid, except these securities, and it is for the Senate to determine whether it is proper now to sell these securities or not. The Kansas Senators think that the Indians who have been driven into the State of Kansas, and who are perfectly destitute, ought to be allowed something at present to relieve their wants, and they urge the passage of the measure. They can speak of its necessity better than I can. The Committee on Indian Affairs have simply guarded the bill so as to prevent any greater danger than must necessarily result from the payment of a debt which is placed entirely beyond our jurisdiction or control, a debt which becomes complete and perfect, provided the Secretary of the Interior shall affirm the reports of the commissioners appointed under the treaty.

Mr. POMEROY. I will not consume time in this discussion. I will merely state that the refugee Indians who have been in Kansas have suffered the loss of all things, and this is simply an effort to reimburse them for something. There is no way of doing it except by allowing the Government to sell some of the stocks that belong to the whole tribe. I have drawn up a proviso which I intend to offer to guard against the points the Senator from Missouri has made, and after the present amendment shall have been acted upon I shall offer the following proviso:

Provided, That no sale shall be made of any of the stocks issued by the State of Indiana, or of any stocks at less than the par value.

This will prevent any stocks being sacrificed; and as the Government is responsible for the par value of all these stocks, it ought not to sell any of them for less than par. This amendment will guard every point I think, and as soon as the pending amendment is disposed of I shall offer it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suppose these debts will have to be paid, whenever they are ascertained to be due by the Secretary of the Interior, by virtue of the provisions of the treaty; but the treaty provides that they shall be paid out of moneys belonging to the Indians in the hands of the United States. Now, the truth is that the United States are indebted to the Choctaw nation, as is claimed by the Choctaw nation, to the amount of nearly two million dollars, funds in the hands of the United States due to the Choctaws. It is true, this claim has been disputed on the part of Congress, and controversies have arisen in regard to it; but that there is a large unsettled balance in favor of the Choctaws in the hands of the Government I believe nobody who has ever investigated the subject can doubt for a single moment. Now, I suggest that if this money now be paid for the purpose of settling the damages suffered by the loyal Indians, the Treasury of the United States ought to pay it, and we ought not to sacrifice these bonds, the interest of which supports the schools and the government of these Indians.

I shall not go into a lengthy statement of the facts, but any person who will examine them will be satisfied that there is a large amount due from the Government of the United States to the Choctaw nation, and this amount ought to be paid out of that fund and not out of the fund which is set apart for the schools and for the support of the government. I think that if these bonds as they are situated were forced into the market to raise $300,000 it would sacrifice the whole fund; or if, as the Senator from Kansas suggests, the Government of the United States is to guaranty that they shall sell at par, we may just as well pay the money. How could you sell the bonds of Arkansas, and the bonds of Virginia, and the bonds of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad Company, and the bonds of the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company at par? We may just as well put our hands in the Treasury and take out the money and pay it as to sell these bonds with our guaranty that they shall sell at par, because we shall have to pay the money. Inasmuch as we owe the Choctaw nation very much more than $300,000, and I have no doubt, on investigation by any persons who will examine it, it will be found to be at least $1,500,000, we had better pay this money out of what we owe them than sacrifice these bonds.

Mr. HARLAN. When the provision which the Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, has read was put in the treaty, there was no controversy on the subject on the part of the delegates of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians. They are intelligent people, cultivated people. They are as highly educated, perhaps, as a majority of the citizens of the United States. They themselves represented that there were certain licensed traders with them at the beginning of the late war, with stocks of provisions and goods which were taken from the traders and used by that people, and they were perfectly willing to pay for them, but stipulated that the maximum amount to be thus paid should not exceed $90,000, I think.

Mr. HENDERSON. No; less than that.

Mr. POMEROY. It was cut down in the Senate at the time of the ratification of the treaty to $50,000, I think.

Mr. HARLAN. At all events the maximum amount which they were willing to pay was placed in the treaty.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Iowa is right. I see by reference to the treaty it was $90,000.

Mr. HARLAN. It was then stated that there were certain Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians who had been driven away by the majority of the tribe, the organization having gone into the rebellion formally, and having by treaty given in their adhesion to the confederate government. They stipulated in the treaty to pay that portion of these tribes for all the property destroyed under their confiscation laws of all that part of the tribe who had been driven North on account of their adhesion to the Government of the United States. It is, however, just to these people to say that they thought there were but few who would present claims of this kind, and that the aggregate amount would not be great, but they manifested a perfect willingness to pay all that those who had been thus driven away were justly entitled to—the value of their houses and orchards and fencing and herds of cattle and horses that had been destroyed by their fellow-members who adhered to the Confederate government. In principle it is right to pay them. Whether the award which has been made is just or not I am not prepared to say. I have understood that the chiefs and officers of these two tribes of Indians say that the cases were examined at too remote a place from the former homes of these people, and therefore that they were unable to get rebutting testimony to show that the amount claimed was exorbitant. If that be found to be true, I apprehend the Secretary of the Interior will order a reexamination and a new award; but if this adjudication has been carefully gone into and the award is correct, the principle is right that the disloyal portion of the tribe should divide their funds with the loyal portion to the extent that they themselves have wantonly damaged them; and that is all there is in the proposition—to compel the disloyal Choctaws and Chickasaws to pay the loyal portion of those two tribes the fair value of the property that they themselves destroyed when they drove the loyal Indians North, and when they themselves went South and gave in their adhesion to the Confederate government.

With the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas, it seems to me that damage can accrue to these people. They themselves were willing, as I personally know, to pay all that was justly due. They will say so now. They are perfectly willing to pay all that is justly due as the fair value of the property thus destroyed.

I apprehend that the loyal Indians would be willing to take these bonds at par probably in payment of their claims; but with the amendment proposed by the committee, that nothing shall be paid until the Secretary of the Interior shall examine the subject and be satisfied that the amount is fairly due, it seems to me there is no danger of wrong being done to these tribes of Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I now move to further amend the resolution by inserting after the word "claims" in line twelve:

Provided, That no sale shall be made of any stock issued by the State of Indiana, nor shall any stock be sold for less than the par value thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. This measure is an illustration of the absurdity of our relations with the Indians. It is now proposed that we alter a treaty without the consent of the other party. If this treaty was regarded like a treaty with Great Britain or France, the proposition would be absurd. We propose now by act of Congress to alter a treaty, and sell the property of a foreign nation held by us in trust, against their remonstrance. The Senator from Missouri informs us that the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes insist that these bonds shall not be sold; that the award now pending before the Secretary of the Interior is wrong; and they resist it. It is proposed now, in violation of the treaty, which says that these claims shall be paid out of moneys in the hands of the United States, that we shall take bonds held by the United States in trust and sell them against the remonstrance of the Indians. This shows the continued absurdity of our relations with the Indian tribes.

Mr. STEWART. Allow me to inquire of the Senator if it would not be as easy to make a direct appropriation of the money?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is precisely what I want to come at. The money that is paid under pretense of selling their bonds will have to be made good by the Treasury. We have no power to sell these bonds; we have no right to sell them. It is a violation of every principle of law and equity to seize the property of these Indian tribes and sell it without their consent. It would not be tolerated between foreign nations for a moment. We treat these people as foreign nations; and now, in violation of every principle of public law, we propose to seize their property, which happens to be in our hands in trust, and sell it, against their remonstrance, for what it will fetch, perhaps, so that it does not bring under par; and the result will be precisely what the Senator from Nevada says, that the United States, out of its own Treasury, must make this money good. That will be the result. On the other hand, if the matter be left as it stands under existing laws, the Secretary of the Interior will examine this award; he will pass upon it after hearing the arguments pro and con. The claims of the loyal Indians are secured by the treaty; the claims of the traders are secured by the treaty; and when the Secretary of the Interior shall have adjudicated and fixed the amount due to these various classes of creditors, he has authority to pay them out of the money of these Indians in his hands. The whole subject of the amount of money due to them is now referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, with instructions to ascertain that amount.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to ask the Senator from Ohio what provision of the treaty is violated by this act?

Mr. SHERMAN. A principle of the law of nations is violated. You propose to take the property of these Indians, which is secured to them by treaty, and against their consent sell it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understood the Senator to say that this violated a treaty stipulation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The other question I may discuss by and by.

Mr. SHERMAN. The treaty says that these awards that are made for the benefit of individuals shall be paid out of certain moneys. There is no money in the Treasury now for their use. There may be eventually by the adjustment of conflicting claims between the United States and the tribe. It is proposed, while there is no money in the Treasury, to take the property of these Indians which is held by us in trust for their schools and for their children, and against their consent to appropriate their school fund to pay certain persons whose claims have grown out of the war; and this against their remonstrance, as we are informed by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

It seems to me it is no great hardship to wait until the amount due the Indians is adjusted between them and the United States, and then they will be paid. But to seize upon a trust fund in our hands, and against the remonstrances of the Indians to sell it, is an act of injustice that will compel us from mere shame to take the money out of the Treasury of the United States and restore the trust fund. It is to that I object. I know many persons are very desirous to have this resolution pass; but I do not think that, acting for the Indians, we ought to undertake to do what, if we were dealing with foreign nations who could enforce their obligations against us, we would not undertake to do.

Mr. POMEROY. The only difference between the Senator from Ohio and those who advocate the passage of this joint resolution is, that he proposes to have these claims paid ultimately, after a report shall have been made to Congress hereafter; and those who are trying to carry out the provisions of this treaty stipulation desire to have them paid as soon as the Secretary of the Interior shall settle upon them as being just and equitable. If he does not come to that conclusion, they are not to be paid at all. I wish to remind the Senator from Ohio of one fact that he seems to have lost sight of. The Government of the United States has no money in its hands belonging to these Indians out of which to pay these awards, from the fact that the former treaty provided that the money in the hands of the United States should be invested in safe and profitable stocks, and those stocks are the money of the Indians. They are not trust funds that come from some other source.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the Senator must be aware that these identical bonds were in the hands of the United States before the last treaty was made.

Mr. POMEROY. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. They never contemplated, therefore, the taking of those bonds to pay these claims.

Mr. POMEROY. But these bonds are all the moneys the Indians have from which anything can be paid. These bonds accrued from the sale of their former reservation before they went to their present homes. The Government of the United States, instead of holding the money under that former treaty, were required to invest it in safe and profitable stocks. Whether the Government has done that or not I do not know; but this resolution merely provides that their money, now held by the United States in the shape of bonds, shall be used to meet the awards provided for by the treaty. This does not determine the question whether the award shall be approved or not. It does not rest on the Secretary of the Interior with the weight of a hair; he is at entire liberty to reject the award as though this joint resolution had not passed. The Senator from Ohio wants to postpone the case to another session of Congress. The claims must be paid; it is only a question of paying them now or a year hence.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the objection made by the Senator from Ohio is merely technical. At the time this treaty was made by these Indians and the United States, they knew the exact condition of their funds as well as it is known now. To suppose this interpretation of the phraseology is correct is to suppose that they intended to commit a fraud on the loyal portion of their tribe. I know this was not their intention, nor was it the intention of the very able legal adviser whom they employed to assist them in considering this treaty. It was a perfectly open transaction, and they were perfectly willing to pay what was justly due for the property actually destroyed. The controversy now, as I understand it, is that they claim that the award is too great, that the cases have not been carefully examined; or, if so, they have been examined at a place and time when and where the organs of the tribe had not an opportunity to introduce rebutting testimony; and this objection to the conversion of the bonds has arisen, as I suppose, merely to secure a reexamination of the cases. It never would have arisen, in my opinion, had it not been for the amount of the award made.

I am inclined to think also that the Senator is in error on technical grounds as to his objection to the passage of this joint resolution. Originally the value of these bonds was money in the hands of the United States. It has been placed in this form with the consent of the Indians, the Indians, however, not knowing what stocks the money was to be invested in, but the investments doubtless were provided to be made in good stocks, nothing more. It was money originally, and has been invested in these bonds. These people were at the time, and I do not doubt they are now, perfectly willing to agree to the conversion of a sufficient amount to pay what is justly due. The question is whether all the money awarded is due from the disloyal portion of these Indians to those who claim to be loyal; and that is the only substantial question in controversy. Then practically, I suppose, the Committee on Indian Affairs have provided a sufficient barrier to fraud in insisting that this case shall be reexamined by the Secretary of the Interior. He will look into it. He surely is an impartial umpire. He can have no interest the one way or the other; and when he shall have carefully reviewed the whole case, if, in his opinion, that amount is justly due to the loyal Indians for depredations committed on them by the disloyal portion of the tribe, it ought to be paid.

Now, as to the claim these Indians set up against the United States under former treat-ties, personally I happen to know that no such claim has been recently set up by these Indians in any formal way. All they insisted on was that their former treaties should not be disturbed. They think they are entitled to something under former treaties. They may be; if so, the United States doubtless will pay them. But that question was not entered into, nor did it become a part of the consideration of this arrangement. It was a voluntary arrangement on the part of those who were disloyal or rebel Indians to pay the damages which they had committed on the loyal portion of the tribe, and I see no propriety in deferring it for a year, unless we are to favor the rebel portion of the tribe rather than those that adhered to the interests of the United States.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This is not a complicated question, and to my mind the justice of it toward the Indians for whose relief it is designed is obvious from a simple statement of the facts.

The object of this resolution is to relieve the distress into which a portion of these tribes have fallen growing out of the difficulties of the late rebellion. They were loyal to the Government; their property was destroyed; and they were thrown into great distress. Of that distress at the present time there is no manner of doubt. It is very great; and I say to the honorable Senator from Ohio, who raises this objection, that while we are providing a million of money to relieve the supposed distresses in another section of the country, we cannot overlook the real distress into which these poor people have been plunged. It must be remembered that they are in a community that do not recognize any claims on them whatever for support, and they are unlike the people for whom we appropriated $1,000,000 the other day in this particular. The necessity, therefore, is exigent; the demand is imperative that we should relieve these people in some way.

We undertook—I speak of the Committee on Indian Affairs—to relieve them at the last session when the civil appropriation bill was before the Senate. We undertook to put upon that bill some relief for these people by way of appropriating a sum of money to be charged hereafter against these Indians with whom we had treaty stipulations, and out of which they claim grows a large indebtedness to them of some two million three hundred thousand dollars. But, sir, the chairman of the Committee on Finance met us with the argument, "that is all unsettled; that is all in the future; that is doubtful; that is an unsettled claim, and therefore we will not honor a draft drawn against an unsettled claim to be determined in the future;" and on the whole the argument seemed to be so conclusive that at any rate the claim was not allowed.

Then the Committee on Indian Affairs, having the same subject under consideration and the same object in view, said, "We must relieve these people in another way; these loyal people have claims on this tribe, and the tribe are in some sense the creditors of the Government; we have got the means in our hands if we do not owe them; we are trustees, and we can relieve these people; if we will not relieve them and charge it over against the debts which they hold due, we have the trust funds in our hands, and we can relieve them there, and we ought to do so." Now, my honorable friend from Ohio says there is an objection to that. In the first place, I understood him to say that it would violate a treaty stipulation; but I suppose he did not intend that. There is no treaty stipulation about it whatever.

Then how does it violate any principle of public law? Let us see. How came we to be the trustee of these persons? Growing out of former treaties we owed these tribes a certain sum of money; a million and a half of money, if you please. It was our business to pay the money. Why did we not? Why, sir, dealing with the Indians as we always have, we said we will not pay the money to these Indians because they will spend it; but we will constitute ourselves self-constituted trustees for the Indians. We made no contract with them; we simply declined to pay the money over to them. If we violated any principle of public law it was in the fact that we did not give them their dues; but we arrogated to ourselves that we were wise and they were foolish, and if we paid the money to them they would spend it. It is not necessary for me to refer to the action in 1867 by those who were in power here at that time; but if you will look at the trust fund you will see what disposition was made of it. This trust fund, instead of being held sacred for these Indians, was, under the power of Congress and under the influence of Congress, put into the hands and turned over to carry forward certain railroad enterprises in the southern States. It has been pretty much sacrificed. I hope when that question comes up we shall have the magnanimity to say that as in our wisdom we would not trust the Indians to take care of their own funds, and as we invested it in this way, we will make it good; but that is not this question.

Now, sir, we hold this money in trust for these tribes. Does anybody deny that we can pay a sum of money which may be found due to the loyal people from those tribes for the destruction of the property of that loyal portion of the tribes? That is the question, and that is all the question.

That being the state of the case, we instituted a commission to ascertain if there had been any destruction of the property of the loyal people, and if so, to what amount, to the end that it should be paid by the tribes. The only question that there is in controversy is the amount of that award; and by the terms of the submission it was to be submitted to the final determination of the Secretary of the Interior. It awaits that. When the Secretary of the Interior passes upon that award; then, by the stipulations between the Government and the tribes, there is so much money as he shall find due to these Indians who have been proved loyal during the war, and the resolution is predicated upon the idea that he will find something due; and in case he does find something due, then we say he shall have power to sell of so much of the funds which came into our hands as money, and which was by us arbitrarily put into those funds, not exceeding $300,000, as shall meet the sum which he thus finds due.

To repeat, I submit that, in the first place, the exigencies of these people demand this relief. I submit, in the second place, that the way for their relief has been agreed upon between the Government and the tribes. It only awaits to make the payment. The money is in our hands; and we violate no principles of comity, no treaty stipulations, no principles of public law whatever. It will turn out as the honorable Senator from Nevada suggested undoubtedly, that if we take so much of this money and appropriate it to the payment of these Indians, and in the future it should be found that we owed it to these people and ought to have paid it to them instead of appropriating this fund in this way, we shall have to make it good; but not otherwise. I therefore submit that there is no difficulty about this case.

Mr. MORTON. The objection that I took to this resolution the other day has been obviated by the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, in excepting from sale the Indiana stocks. The principle involved in the resolution that the disloyal shall pay for the losses suffered by the loyal is right in itself; but I simply want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we are prescribing for the disloyal Indians a rule that we are not willing to apply to disloyal whites in the South. We have required the disloyal Indians by treaty to indemnify the loyal Indians for their losses of property; but we do not require the disloyal whites of the rebel States to indemnify the loyal whites for the loss of their property. The equity is quite as strong in favor of the loyal whites of the South, who have lost everything and been driven from their homes, as it is in favor of the loyal Indians who have lost everything and been driven from their homes. I do not say that this is an argument why this resolution should not pass. I simply remark that we are willing to apply a rule to feeble and helpless Indians that we are not willing to apply to arrogant rebels in the rebel States.

Mr. JOHNSON. If these Indians are, in consequence of their adherence to their obligation to the Government, in a state of suffering, almost in a state of starvation, I think it is our clear duty to provide for them. The only question with me is, whether the provision which we are asked to make is a proper one. If I understand the treaty which was made in 1866, it went, in relation to this subject, upon the hypothesis that there was, or would be when the award should be made in pursuance of it, money in the hands of the Government adequate to meet what might be found to be the extent of the damages which these loyal Indians had sustained. At that time and now, as we understand from the committee to whom the subject has been referred—and the former Secretary of the Interior who now honors us by his presence will set me right if I am wrong—there was a very large claim made by the Choctaws and other Indians whose property we are now about to take, against the United States, amounting, I believe, in the aggregate to some two million dollars. I understand the honorable member from Maine to say that he believes that that claim is due either in whole or in part; certainly due to an extent that would be sufficient to meet any demands which the loyal Indians may succeed in making good before the Secretary of the Interior.

Now, I can very well imagine, and such I understand is the statement of the Indians, that when they agreed to that provision of the treaty which is involved in this debate they supposed that the amount which they might be found to owe would be discharged out of the debt due by the United States to them. At that time, as now, the United States held in trust for the Indians bonds of the several States which they had purchased with the moneys that came into their possession belonging to the Indians. It was thought better for the Indians, to whom those moneys were then due, that the United States should invest the amount in stocks to be selected by themselves, and they selected the stocks of several of the States and stocks in some of the railroads. But that was made as an investment, and it was made under the belief that it would result in giving to the Indians more than the actual amount of the par value of the stocks. It was supposed that it would be a good speculation for them; and the United States, in the discharge of their duty as faithful trustees, wishing that the money which they owed to the Indians should be profitable to them instead of lying in the Treasury where no interest was accruing upon it, invested it in stocks which they expected to appreciate; and they were in process of appreciation.

My friend from Kansas has removed one of the objections to the resolution upon your table which struck me as fatal to it, mentioned by the honorable member from Indiana and by the honorable member from Ohio, in providing that the stocks so held shall not be sold by the Secretary of the Interior unless they bring par; but does that protect the Indians? These stocks were worth a great deal more than par, have been worth more than par since the investment was made, and they will be, it is to be hoped, worth a great deal more than par in the future. Now, one of two things will be the result if you sell their stocks at par: that the Indians will be deprived of the very benefit which it was the purpose of the investment to secure, or that the United States will feel themselves bound, as I think they will be, to make good the difference between the par value of the stock, if we sell it at par, and its appreciated value in the future.

My idea is, that we have no right to speculate upon the property of these Indians. If we owe them, as I understand "the honorable member from Maine to admit, a large sum of money, then the proper mode to provide against the suffering which it is the object of this resolution to guard against, is to pay out of the Treasury a sufficient sum to provide for their immediate wants. But that is not what we propose to do. We propose to do what the honorable member from Ohio, I think very properly says, is, upon the doctrine of the law of nations, inadmissible. We propose to sequester property and sell it against the protest of the parties to whom it belongs in order to comply with a provision in this treaty, as we construe it, which may result in loss to the owners of the property, although it is admitted that we owe to the owners of the property debts more than sufficient to pay the amount which may fall due under the treaty of 1866 now in the Treasury. It seems to me, therefore, that that is clearly wrong; to my mind, obviously wrong.

I know nothing about what has been done under the treaty, and if there is any wrong in it, that I suppose will be redressed by the supervision to which it is made subject of the Secretary of the Interior. But I understand that the Indians, whose property we are now asked to dispose of for the purpose of meeting this award, insist that the whole extent of the damage done to the Indians called loyal is but thirty or forty thousand dollars at the utmost; and they have obtained an award before this commission amounting to upward of three hundred thousand dollars; and the effect of sequestering the stocks which we now hold for the Indians will be to break up all their schools. That, I suppose, is not the purpose of the Senate, whatever may be the circumstances, to bring about. How are those schools to be supported? You take from them the fund with which they now support them, and you hold in your hands the funds which you owe them, and say you will not pay them except at your own pleasure hereafter, and in the mean time all their schools are to be shut up. That seems to me to be obviously unjust.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The error, if I may be permitted to say so, under which the honorable Senator from Maryland argues, is in supposing that this is an adversary proceeding against the Choctaws. This resolution is precisely in harmony with the stipulations of the treaty entered into by all these Indians in 1866. I will read the article of the treaty and see if this is not the logical, necessary, and equitable deduction from that provision of the treaty. I refer to article forty-nine of the treaty entered into last year:

"And it is further agreed that a commission, to consist of a person or persons to be appointed by the President of the United States, shall be appointed immediately on the ratification of this treaty, who shall take into consideration and determine the claim of such Choctaws and Chickasaws as allege that they have been driven during the late rebellion from their homes in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations on account of their adhesion to the United States, for damages, with power to make such award as may be consistent with equity and good conscience, taking into view all circumstances; whose report, when ratified by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be final."

Here is the point:

"And authorize the payment of the amount from any moneys of said nations in the hands of the United States as the said commission may award."

Now, one thing is very clear: that by force of this treaty, by this treaty stipulation, these tribes in any event were to pay such damages as should be ascertained by this commission to the persons who claimed that they had been damaged by the destruction of their property. That is not doubted. It was to be paid upon the finding of the commission and the approbation and the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. Paid out of what? How paid? Paid out of any money in the hands of the Government. What money had we belonging to those nations in our hands? We had this money, and no other. We had these stocks, and no other, unless you look to the indebtedness which has been talked about here. What propriety was there in calling these stocks money? This was money due these people under an original treaty. They considered it money. They looked to us as holding such money in our hands. They have never consented to the investment of that money in stocks. It does not lie in our mouths to say that these stocks belong to the Indians. They do not. We owe them the amount of money which we invested in the stocks, and therefore they employed this language in the treaty. We owe them money; $1,500,000. It matters not to the Indians that we have invested it in stocks. We shall never be able to clear the skirts of this nation, we shall never be able to satisfy the conscience of this nation, and we shall never be able to meet the claims of the Indians by saying to them we took this $1,500,000 and invested it in stocks, United States stocks or railroad stocks. I say it is money, money then and money now; and when they used this language in the treaty, they expected that whatever was found due these loyal Indians should be charged on that money. Therefore, we are acting in the strictest conformity with the spirit and the letter of that article of the treaty when we propose by this resolution to say that whatever sum shall be found by the Secretary due these loyal Indians under that commission shall be paid out of the money in the hands of the Government that is represented by the stocks, to raise which the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make the sale of the securities which represent that money.

Mr. CORBETT. I move to amend the joint resolution by adding to it the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the same amount realized from the sale of said stocks shall be reinvested in United States stocks out of any money that may be found due said tribe on the final settlement with said tribe.

My object in offering this amendment is that it may be satisfactory to all parties. It is supposed there is quite a large amount of money due this tribe. They claim by a former treaty something like two million dollars. If that amount be found due to them, or any portion of it, I propose that the money on the final settlement with them be reinvested in United States stocks. I presume that that amendment will be satisfactory to all.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is no possible objection to that that I know of, except it may be doubtful whether it was not an entirely arbitrary act on the part of the Government in investing this money in stocks originally; and if in the future a sum of money such as is contemplated should be found due to these Indians it may be questionable whether they ought not to have a voice in what shall be done with it, whether they want to continue the trust.

Mr. POMEROY. I think there is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think that the tribe by request or petition can have those stocks sold if they desire it at any time. There can be no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to present this question in another shape, that is altogether more satisfactory to me, and in which I think it will be equally satisfactory to the Senate. I propose a substitute for the resolution; so that it shall read in this way:

That to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the claims of certain Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, and other loyal persons, as are provided for in the forty-ninth and fiftieth articles of treaty concluded with Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians on the 28th of April, 1866, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum of money sufficient to pay the same, not exceeding the sum of $250,000: Provided, That in the future adjustment of the claim of the Choctaws under the eleventh and twelfth sections of the treaty of the 22d of June, 1855, the said sum shall be charged against the said Indians: And provided also, That no money shall be paid on such claims unless the Secretary of the Interior shall have first examined and ratified or approved the awards made by the commissioners as stipulated in the forty-ninth and fiftieth articles of the treaty of April 28, 1866: And provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as recommending for his approval any awards already made under said treaty.

If I can get the ear of the Senate on this subject for a moment I will state this case. I think it will be more satisfactory to the Senate to dispose of the question in this way, and certainly it will be more just to the Indians themselves. Under the treaty of June, 1855, we agreed with the Choctaw nation to pay them for the lands which we had acquired of them and had sold, and for the lands which we had acquired of them and had not sold, a certain sum of money which should be determined by the Senate of the United States. It was left by the Indians to the Senate. The question was presented to the Senate, and the Senate made their award, in which they decided that the Indians should be paid for the lands sold, what the lands brought over and above the expenses of sale, and for the lands which they had on hand and not sold, twelve cents an acre; and the Secretary of the Interior was directed to make up that amount. He did so. It amounted to the sum of $2,300,000. We, by the award of this Senate, by the treaties made with those tribes, were bound to the payment of that sum of money. But, sir, when the appropriation was asked for, as long ago as 1859, again in 1860, and again in 1861, the amount seemed so large that when it came up and was offered on the appropriation bills it was resisted by the Committee on Finance, and after a struggle in the Senate a provision finally was made to this effect, which I will read, in the appropriation bill of March, 1861:

"For payment to the Choctaw nation or tribe of Indians on account of their claim under the eleventh and twelfth articles of the treaty, &c., $500,000."

Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars to be paid in money and $250,000 to be paid in bonds, &c., with this proviso, similar to the one which I have inserted in the proposed substitute:

"Provided, That in the future adjustment of the claim of the Choctaws under the treaty aforesaid, the said sum shall be charged against the said Indians."

This was in 1861. The rebellion came on directly after. It came on while $250,000 of this money was still in the Treasury of the United States. In 1862 we provided by a law of Congress that, inasmuch as the Choctaw nation had sided with the rebellion, we would confiscate their annuities and the allowance which had been appropriated. The amount of their annuities and the amount of the $250,000 which was appropriated was confiscated under the act of Congress of 1862, and was used in defraying the expenses of the loyal refugee Indians who were driven out of the Indian Territory into the State of Kansas. From year to year, while the war was going on, we confiscated their annuities. We did not confiscate the principal sum, and it never was confiscated. By the treaty made with these Indians in 1866 it was provided that any moneys due to the Indians remained due to them, but none of the annuities which accrued during the war were to be paid. The money was to be paid to them, to commence after the end of the fiscal year 1866. The tenth article of the treaty is as follows:

"The United States reaffirm all obligations arising out of treaty stipulations or acts of legislation with regard to the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, entered into prior to the late rebellion, and in force at that time, not inconsistent herewith; and further agree to renew the payment of all annuities and other moneys accruing under such treaty stipulation and acts of legislation, from and after the close of the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, in the year 1866."

Now, Mr. President, these are the moneys in our hands. We owe the money to these Indians; and when a man owes another man money he has money in his hands. It was these moneys which we owed to these people, which they agreed might be applied in the satisfaction of these debts. The claim of Heald and others of $90,000, and the claim of the loyal Indians who were driven out and stripped by the rebellion, were to be paid out of the moneys in the hands of the United States. We have the amount. I know gentlemen start back and say the amount is large. But there is still $1,800,000 due to these Indian tribes. I admit that it is a large sum of money; but the award and the law and the treaty bind you with as much certainty as you are bound to one of the bonds issued by the United States Government. There is no doubt about it. Now, then, owing them the money, let us pay this award out of the money we owe them, and not sacrifice the trust fund.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the Senator must be satisfied that we cannot pass the measure at this session if his amendment should be adopted, appropriating money. There is no committee in the House to consider this bill if it contains an appropriation; and it is simply wasting the time of the Senate to consider it, and we shall not pass the measure at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. It has been rejected about six times.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The claim has never been rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was debated and discussed in the House of Representatives when I was a member there, and there was a very long and elaborate debate upon it in the Senate. This is an old claim growing out of the stipulations of a treaty in regard to lands before they were removed to this Indian country; the treaty of 1828. The claim which the Senator is now seeking to get an indorsement of is one that is about forty years old.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I seek no further indorsement than was given by Congress in 1861.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state further, that after a long and elaborate debate, in which Mr. Sebastian, not now a Senator, made a report, it was assented to by the Senate, but was never accepted by the House. It was an old controverted question as to the amount that should be paid for certain lands embraced in the treaty. If this amendment is adopted we recognize the validity of this claim. By the action of the Senate, on my own motion, the other day, the Senate referred this whole matter to a committee of this body, with instructions to make a full and minute examination of the claim and report at the next session. Now, when there is no Committee on Indian Affairs in the House, when there is no Committee on Appropriations there, it is proposed to thrust this old claim thus provided for into the Senate and make this a recognition of the claim. It seems to me that is very unwise. We ought not to do that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask the Senate to make no more recognition of the claim than was made by Congress in 1861, for the amendment follows precisely the language which was then adopted by Congress. It simply admits the fact that they have a claim. No one can deny it. The treaty declares it: the award of the Senate made it.

Mr. SHERMAN. There was no award.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think my honorable friend will find, when he comes to examine it, that there was an award. If there was no award made by the Senate, and the amount is not fixed, and you go into the stipulations of the treaty itself, I think the Senator will find that the amount due these Indian tribes is largely in excess of the award; because the complaint that was always made by those who represented the Indians was that in that very award of the Senate some six or eight hundred thousand dollars was taken from the amount which was due to them. But, however that may be, without fixing at all the amount that may be due, if there is anything wrong about the amount it can be adjusted; the committee can examine and report; but as to there being more than this amount of $250,000 due I have no more doubt than that we sit in this Chamber; and I think it is better, dealing with the Indians, for us to pay out the money in our hands than it is for us to take their trust funds, bonds, &c., and perhaps sacrifice them in the market. That is the reason why I submit this proposition. I shall take the sense of the Senate upon it. I simply express my views as they appear to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. STEWART. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. We cannot make any such appropriation at this stage of the session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to hear the amendment read before I am called on to vote upon it.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. It opens up the question of a disputed claim, in the first place, that we are not prepared to pass upon, and in the next place it is an appropriation of money when we do not need to appropriate a dollar; and there is no committee, as has been stated, in the House of Representatives to consider an appropriation bill. It is only another method of defeating the measure before the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think a resolution from the House appropriating $500,000 was passed a short time since.

Mr. POMEROY. I say there is no Committee on Indian Affairs there. It is the Committee on Indian Affairs that will have to consider this question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There must be some committee or some organization in the House that looks to appropriations, where they can appropriate half a million in the morning before breakfast almost.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator must recollect that he agreed to this resolution in committee with all the other members of it. The resolution that is now before the Senate, not the substitute, is the very resolution that the Senator himself agreed to in committee with all the other members of the committee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I never refer to what occurs in committee; but as allusion is made to it, I will state that this same matter was presented in committee. I there expressed my preference for a direct appropriation. It is true, if the resolution was to pass in the form in which it was reported from the committee, I was in favor of the amendment which the honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORBETT] has suggested, to wit, that there should be a provision that these trust funds that were sold should be restored again after they were paid their money.

Mr. POMEROY. That amendment has already been agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I say, if the resolution is to pass as it came from the committee, I prefer it with the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon; but I maintained in committee just as I maintain now: that I think it is better for us to appropriate the money and pay the claim, and then charge it over when we come to the final adjustment of the claim of the Choctaw nation.

Mr. CORBETT. This subject was fully discussed in the committee, and the Senator must know that we came to the conclusion that neither the Senate nor the House would agree to an appropriation at this time of $250,000 for this purpose, and therefore we determined to report this resolution, and, as I supposed, it would be reported with the amendment that I have offered. I presume it was inadvertently omitted and overlooked; and hence I have offered it in the Senate. I trust that the Senate will reject the proposition offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, and that they will pass the joint resolution as we have amended it.

Mr. STEWART. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following additional proviso:

And provided further: That the said sum of money hereby appropriated shall be received by said Indians in full satisfaction of the claims of said Indians under said treaty.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not think that would be just, because the amount claimed by them is $1,800,000; and the Secretary of the Interior, presenting all the facts—his letter is before the Senate—stated that that was the sum that was clearly due, in his judgment. Now, to say that $250,000 shall be accepted in full payment would not be right.

Mr. STEWART. I want a settlement of this claim at some time. Although the statute of limitations may not run against it, the facts connected with it and the merits of it are so remote that they have pretty nearly vanished from the memory of man. If we make this payment now, it will be an indorsement implying that a large amount is still due. The claim will continue to swell as long as you make payments upon it and renew it from year to year. It is an entirely unascertained, vague, ancient, stale claim. If we are to make any appropriation in regard to it, I want it to be the last appropriation, and to have that understood.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will inform my friend, if he will allow me, that we made the last appropriation in 1859 or 1860. We paid them $1,200,000, I think, as a compromise, in full, as we supposed.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Maine proposed it as a compromise; but I do not think it was accepted on the other side.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The money was paid, at any rate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to state to the Senator from Maine the precise language used on that occasion to refresh his recollection. I will read from the appropriation bill. I know there was a good deal of discussion upon it, in which the Senator from Maine and Robert W. Johnson, of Arkansas, took part. Who it was that made the proposition which was finally accepted I do not remember; but this is the section:

"For payment to the Choctaw nation or tribe of Indians, on account of their claim under the eleventh and twelfth articles of the treaty with said nation or tribe, made the 22d of June, 1855, the sum of $500,000; $250,000 of which sum shall be paid in money; and for the residue the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be issued to the proper authorities of the nation or tribe, on their requisition, bonds of the United States authorized by law at the present session of Congress: Provided, That in the future adjustment of the claim of the Choctaws under the treaty aforesaid, the said sum shall be charged against the said Indians."

Now, in the course of the whole of that discussion, it will be found that it was conceded by gentlemen in the Senate, even those who resisted what was asked for by the Committee on Indian Affairs, when Mr. Sebastian was chairman, that there was $1,200,000 due. The controversy was about that which was over and above the sum of $1,200,000. After a long controversy, as it was urged that the Indians were in a suffering condition and needed money, this provision was put into the appropriation bill to appropriate $500,000, with the understanding that when you came to the final adjustment of the amount claimed the $500,000 should be charged against them; but that was not a settlement; it was not accepted in full at all, therefore the amount of the claim remains precisely where it stood then, by virtue of the treaty and by the avowal made by the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think the same objection can be urged against the proviso that I offer that may be urged against the law that is referred to. I think the language in this proviso is more definite and better calculated to cut off the various claims that will come in, all of which I believe to be unjust. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that at that time Congress omitted some very important words. They did not make it definite that that should be received in satisfaction of all claims. If we do not put a stop to them by some kind of legislation we shall never get to the end of these claims. It is unfortunate that more appropriate words were not used in that law. I think I have avoided that difficulty in the proviso that I have presented to the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The better way would be to vote down all the amendments, and then to vote down the resolution itself.

Mr. STEWART. I will make one other remark. I think we made a great mistake in reviving the claims of these disloyal Indians by the treaty of last year. I think it was wrong.

Mr. HENDERSON. Why did you not object then?

Mr. STEWART. I did, and called for the yeas and nays, and Senators were very angry with me for so doing. I should like to see an end of these stale obligations that come up in this form. I am utterly opposed to making any appropriation, if we are bound to make any appropriation at all, until we know that that appropriation will be a final one. Now, the law that has been read appropriating $500,000, which, as the Senator from Maine states, it was supposed would settle the whole matter, is presented here as an indorsement for further appropriations. If we keep on legislating in that way the claims will continue and increase as time advances.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think the proposition of the Senator from Nevada would be regarded as an extraordinary proposition made by any civilized people to any civilized community; and I think it would be a savage proposition if it was made to savages. I am not surprised that it is made, because from the little knowledge I have of the history of our conduct with the Indians I think it is just about on a par with the morals and the good faith and the equity that we observe toward the Indians. Here is a proposition to carry out the judgment of a commission entered into by the Government of the United States with an independent nation. That is the way we stand toward the Indians and the world. It has been adjudicated and only awaits now the approval of one of the high functionaries of the Government of the United States to say how much is due; and the Senate are considering the propriety of paying what shall be found due according to the stipulations of the high contracting parties; and the Senator from Nevada thinks it comports with the dignity of the Government and equity and good conscience to say that if we pay that sum it shall be in full of all demands, without knowing what those demands are, or caring to know apparently.

Now, sir, these tribes, these independent nations with whom we make treaties solemnly here, say we owe them $2,300,000; and committees of this body who have investigated it think that is true; and the commission appointed by the Government have found so much due; and yet the Senator from Nevada rises here and says, "If you seek to carry out the commission instituted by this Government, and which now awaits execution by an appropriation of $300,000, I insist upon it that that shall be in full of all demands." If I had any reason to suppose that the honorable Senator knew anything about the claim, whether it was due or undue, whether, in other words, it was not an entire sham, I could understand how he could make such a proposition as that; but when the records of the Senate for the last two or three years disclose the fact, and within a month past a discussion on this floor has shown that committees of this body have reported some two millions or more due these Indians, I cannot understand how a Senator can rise here and propose to make the payment and enforcement of a stipulation which we have openly entered into a condition that it shall absolve us from all obligations to the payment of debts we may owe these Indians.

I hear it said, "it is best to vote this down, and then vote down the resolution." Well, I think that is manly compared with any attempt to evade it. If the Senate of the United States are not sufficiently informed on this subject to vote intelligently on the resolution they ought to vote it down or postpone it to a day when we can have a full consideration of it. I do not object to that. If Senators are not well informed on the subject they ought to do it; but to undertake to give it a side blow, to undertake to put upon it an amendment which ignores your obligations and breaks your faith with parties with whom you solemnly contract by treaty stipulations, I object to.

Mr. STEWART. It appears that the Senator from Maine thinks this is a savage proposition. I suppose we are dealing with savages, and I suppose there are a great many savages between us and the Indians that we ought to deal with more savagely than we do. I suppose we are dealing indirectly with savages; but I do not think we are savage enough to the middlemen who are generally connected with these transactions.

These Indians went to war with the United States. They had an old, stale claim that Congress had not paid, some forty years old. They forfeited all their claims upon the generosity of Congress; they forfeited all their legal claims; they became rebels. The rebellion cost the Government of the United States a very large amount of money. After that, we find a treaty passed through here which revives these stale claims that are uninvestigated, which was wrong to begin with, which we should not have passed; and now we are asked to make an appropriation on account, before there is investigation and before the Senate has any information as to how much is to be paid under this treaty, which I claim should not have passed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My friend will allow me to say that he is arguing all out of the facts. We do not ask any such thing. The resolution has no reference whatever to the claims unascertained. We simply say that when the Secretary shall determine that any particular sum is due under the stipulations into which the Government of the United States entered with these tribes he shall pay, out of the funds in his hands, the amounts so found due. That is all there is of it.

Mr. STEWART. Then, as I understand it, these claims that fall due under this particular provision of the treaty, which Congress has failed to make an appropriation for, which are questioned entirely, without the report of the Secretary before us, without knowing whether we shall ever be called upon to appropriate a cent, we are called upon to enforce in advance before we have them before us.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to ask the Senator if he is now discussing the merits of the original proposition as reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, or the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HENDERSON. Neither one.

Mr. STEWART. You make an appropriation by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin of this amount of money, do you not?

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will allow me, the original proposition is not to appropriate from the Treasury a single dollar.

Mr. STEWART. I know; and I am not discussing the original proposition.

Mr. HARLAN. In the adjustment between the rebel portion and the loyal portion of these Indians the rebel portion agree to pay the loyal portion the value of the property which they destroyed when they drove the loyal Indians North, and to pay it out of the moneys in the hands of the United States belonging to these rebel Indians.

Mr. STEWART. I understand that treaty perfectly. It was this: the United States very graciously and very generously revived these old claims that should have been repudiated at once after these Indians rebelled; but said at the same time, "We will punish you severely; we will give you money that does not belong to you, that you have no title to, but we will come down on you, and make you give it to the other Indians."

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator is mistaken. In the treaty of 1866 there was not a dollar given to the Indians at all.

Mr. STEWART. There was a claim revived.

Mr. HENDERSON. Not at all. There was no claim revived even. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. STEWART. I am not mistaken. You say in that treaty of 1866 that they shall have all that is due them under former treaties. You revive their claims. The language is:

"The United States reaffirms all obligations arising out of treaty stipulations or acts of legislation with regard to the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, entered into prior to the late rebellion, and in force at that time, not inconsistent herewith; and the United States further agrees to renew the payment of all annuities," &c.

Now, it was admitted that these treaty stipulations had been broken by the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations. There was no obligation on the part of the Government in regard to those claims. They were old claims, forty years old. The Indians had rebelled, broken their treaty stipulations. There was no obligation in the world on us; but these claims are to be revived.

Mr. HARLAN. I am sure the Senator from Nevada desires to know what the facts were, and would not intentionally misrepresent them. On that point, the facts are these: Congress passed a law authorizing the President of the United States to declare void treaties previously made between these Indians and the United States; but in point of fact this declaration on the part of the President had never been made, and when the war terminated, therefore, it left these treaties in full force on account of the act of Congress itself and the refusal of the President of the United States to make any such declaration. The new treaty that was made merely obligated the Indians to sanction the payment of the interest that had accrued on their bonds during the whole period of the war to the refugee portions of these tribes. The negotiators did not deem, under the law as it then existed, that they had authority to declare those treaties void, because Congress had provided that the President might do so if he thought proper, and he never did so.

Mr. STEWART. But this treaty, so far from declaring these former obligations void, renews them; and before any appropriation is made upon that I want to see what the extent of those obligations is. It seems to me before any appropriation is made on account of former obligations we should ascertain the extent of those obligations and have a final settlement. I think we made a great mistake in renewing the obligations which the Indians had broken; we ought never to have recognized these old, stale, questionable claims of the Indians. I say we made a great mistake in renewing them, and before we legislate further I want to fully understand the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. Since the Senator from Wisconsin has brought this matter again before the Senate, at a period when certainly there ought to be no action upon it, I feel it my duty, as I was connected with the subject in the House of Representatives seven years ago, to call the attention of the Senate to its history. Now, I state that the Senate of the United States never recognized or approved what he calls the award of $2,300,000; that this award, as he calls it, was an estimate made in 1847. The subject was again brought before the Senate of the United States by Mr. Sebastian, of Arkansas, in 1859 and 1860 and 1861. I have looked up the Journal of the Senate, and will now show the history of this proposition.

On the 2d of February, 1861, Mr. Sebastian, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, moved an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill, in which he recognized this claim, asserting it to be $1,202,560 85, setting out the provisions and the terms of the claim. This was debated in the Senate and it was rejected by a vote of 17 yeas to 27 nays. I see that my friend from Maine took a part in the debate and offered an amendment. After debate, the proposition was rejected by the Senate. However, a motion was made a few days afterward, the bill still being pending in the Senate, to reconsider that vote, and it was reconsidered by a vote of 29 yeas to 15 nays. Then the proposition was amended, and Mr. Sebastian reduced the claim from $2,300,000 to $1,202,560 85, and that was said to be "the undisputed balance" due. He fell more than a million dollars in what he said was the undisputed balance. A long debate occurred in the Senate as to whether that amount was due, and the amendment containing the reduced appropriation was finally carried by a vote of yeas 21, nays 20; one majority.

That is the history of the action of the Senate. They voted down a proposition to appropriate $2,300,000, and the proposition to appropriate $1,202,000 only prevailed by one majority. It came to the House of Representatives as an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill. I was then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and remember the matter distinctly. It was examined; we then had more time to examine such matters than we have now, and we rejected it. I cannot now go into the reasons of the rejection because I do not like to speak about a matter of this kind without reading up; but I know the House treated the action of the Senate in 1847 as entirely nugatory. The claim itself was not believed to be a just one. The House of Representatives, by a very large vote after debate, rejected the claim; and my impression is that the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House reported against it; but I shall not be positive on that point. At any rate, the House after debate rejected the scheme; but finally a committee of conference—it is one of those things which are apt to occur in committees of conference, but they ought never to occur—agreed on this patched-up, incoherent, provision which we find in the law. The Senate proposition appropriated $1,202,000 in full satisfaction of the whole claim; but the House, refusing to agree to the Senate's proposition, rejecting the whole claim, a committee of conference patched up this mongrel affair, which is now read as a law, recognizing the whole claim of $2,300,000. The fact is that neither House recognized the claim. The Senate rejected it, but afterward a reconsideration was had, and it prevailed by one majority, the amount being reduced. The House rejected it entirely, and the $500,000 appropriation was put in by a committee of conference in order to get rid of the controversy.

That is the whole history of the matter. We know that this claim is an old claim, and it will be pressed upon us year after year. Therefore it was that to avoid this controversy I introduced a proposition that the Committee on Indian Affairs should give this matter a full and impartial examination, going to the root of the controversy, and should report to us the truth of the whole case. On that committee the Senator from Wisconsin will have an opportunity to be heard, for he is a member of that committee. The Committee on Indian Affairs can examine it. But now for us to again recognize what the Senator says is an undisputed claim of $2,300,000 by appropriating $300,000 more out of a fund which does not exist, it seems to me is improper legislation at this time. Sending it to the other House in the present condition of things, without a Committee on Indian Affairs, without any standing committees except the Committee on Military Affairs and one or two others, would either lead to its sudden passage there without the full consideration that the magnitude of the subject demands, or it would lead to the defeat of the whole proposition. I think, myself, the whole subject might very properly go over until the next session. But I see a very great difference between the proposition now presented by the Senator from Wisconsin, which recognizes the existence of this old claim, and the proposition reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, which merely, in my judgment, in violation of the law of nations, seizes upon the trust fund and applies it without the consent of the Indians to whom it belongs.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask the Senator from Ohio to read the proposition of Mr. Sebastian which passed the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator can read it himself. I will hand him the book; it is half a page long.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will read just what was passed by the Senate upon Mr. Sebastian's motion:

"For carrying into effect the eleventh article of the treaty with the Choctaw tribe of Indians made the 22d day of June, 1835, and the award of the Senate made pursuant thereto on the 9th of March, 1859, the sum of $1,202,565 85, being the undisputed balance due them, so much thereof as the proper authorities of the tribe shall determine to be necessary for the payment of the claims which, by the twelfth article of the treaty, the Choctaws have assumed to pay, and of such other liabilities of the tribe as they may ascertain and determine to be just, shall be paid over on their requisition at such time and in such manner as they shall request; and the residue remain to be held in trust for the benefit of the Choctaws, according to the provisions of the thirteenth article of said treaty.

"In lieu of making such payments in money, the Secretary of the Treasury may, at his discretion, issue to the Choctaws, on their requisition as aforesaid, certificates of stock in the name of the United States, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually at the Treasury of the United States; said certificates to be redeemable in ten years, or sooner, at the pleasure of the President of the United States, and to be transferable by the proper authorities of the Choctaw nation in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe."

Now comes the disputed part of the claim:

"Provided, That the question whether the undetermined balance not now appropriated of $1,130,000 of the sum reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs as due the Choctaws under the treaty and award as aforesaid, is a legitimate charge against the Choctaws by the terms of the said award, be reserved for the future decision of the Senate."

The Senate by a vote of 29 to 15 at that time declared that there was an undisputed balance due these Indians of $1,202,565 85; the rest of the claim was disputed.

Mr. SUMNER. The former amendment of Mr. Sebastian said that $2,300,000 was "the undisputed balance"—the same language.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senate voted that down by 17 to 27. The Senate decided that that was not an undisputed balance; and then they decided by a vote of 29 to 15 that $1,202,000 was an undisputed balance, and that the remainder of the claim was to be reserved for the further decision of the Senate, because it had been submitted by the Indians in the treaty to the Senate to make the award; and while the Senate at that time did not pass the precise sum found due by the award, it settled the principles of adjustment and directed the computation to be made by the Secretary of the Interior. When the appropriation made by the Senate in 1861 went to the House, it is true, the House rejected it; but after a conference between the two Houses the provision which I have read from the law was inserted. And what was that provision? It said in substance that $500,000 should be appropriated on account of this claim and charged against the Indians in the first settlement. It was not a proposition that they should receive $500,000 in full; no proposition declaring that to be the whole amount of the claim; but it recognized that the claim existed and made an appropriation on account in part payment. When the Senate then decided the undisputed balance to be over one million two hundred thousand dollars, and we have only appropriated $500,000, I insist that it is clear and beyond question that much more than two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of money is now in our hands belonging to these people, and which money we ought to pay over ourselves rather than take their trust funds and put them upon the market, and perhaps sacrifice them.

Mr. STEWART. I thought I understood this question, and now I see that I did perfectly. This claim is forty years old. It was reported by a Senator from Arkansas that there was an undisputed balance of $2,300,000. That was rejected; and then he offered a proposition declaring that there was an undisputed balance of $1,202,000. In that shape the Senate passed it, but the House rejected it, and a conference committee agreed on an appropriation of $500,000, which the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] supposed was a settlement of the affair. Five hundred thousand dollars from $1,200,000 leaves $700,000; and yet it is now stated to-day again that there is an undisputed balance of $2,000,000. It seems to an outsider who does not understand the ins and outs of the Indian business, that a claim which is that old and that elastic should be examined before there is anything more paid on account, before it is taken out of the statute of limitation by any more payments. It appears that a treaty was made last year which undertakes to revive these old claims. It undertook to revive this stale claim, which certainly must have been repudiated by these Indians going into rebellion. That treaty, as I remember it, simply reaffirmed the prior treaty obligations; but it seems that under this reaffirmance of the treaty obligations the Secretary of the Interior has ordered a commission, and this commission has reported a very large amount to be due; and before that comes to Congress for investigation, in anticipation that there will be a favorable opinion from the Secretary of the Interior, we are asked again to pay something on account and revive this old claim. Those of us who are not conversant with these matters would be much better satisfied if the claim was first investigated and adjusted by somebody, so that we could pay it and get a receipt in full; because a claim that can vary all the way from seven hundred thousand dollars to two million three hundred thousand dollars is a dangerous claim. I think we have not sufficient information for us to legislate upon the subject.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. We have already consumed nearly three hours upon this subject and obtained a vast deal of information; but I think there is quite as much information yet to be given to the Senate as we have already received. Certainly the Indian doctors do not seem to agree this morning very well in relation to this claim. I therefore ask whether my friend from Kansas, who has this resolution in charge, will not consent that it be postponed until next session, or that it be recommitted to the committee?

Mr. POMEROY. I hope we shall be allowed to have a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, and after that is voted down, if we are not then able to pass the resolution, I want it either killed or postponed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I must say that I think this simply a useless consumption of time, for I do not believe there is anything like a majority of the Senate ready for any final action upon so important a subject.

Mr. POMEROY. This bringing in of an old claim by the Senator from Wisconsin is only trying to get from the Senate an indorsement of what the Senate cannot indorse and are not prepared to indorse. It does not belong to this measure, properly, at all. I think if that amendment be voted down, there will be no difficulty in disposing of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 25) providing for the importation into the United States of certain works of art duty free;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 26) authorizing the Second Auditor to settle the accounts of officers of the Army in certain cases;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 27) to change the name of Moritz Judkiewicz to Morris Judd; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 28) for the relief of soldiers who are entitled to artificial limbs.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 7) providing for the expenses of carrying into full effect an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States;" and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

DUTIES ON UMBRELLAS AND SPRINGS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 16) fixing the rate of duty on umbrellas and on wire spiral furniture springs, have directed me to report it back and recommend its passage; and I ask for its present consideration. It is merely to correct a mistake.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that hereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon umbrellas, parasols, and sun-shades, imported from foreign countries, when made on silk, no lower rate of duty than that now imposed upon piece and dress silks, namely, sixty per cent. ad valorem, and when made of other materials than silk the duty shall be fifty per cent. ad valorem; and that wire spiral furniture springs, imported from foreign countries, manufactured of iron wire, shall be required to pay the same rate of duty as now imposed on iron wire, namely, two cents per pound, and fifteen per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will merely state that in 1864 the duties upon piece silk were raised to sixty per cent., and through inadvertence the duties on silk umbrellas were not raised, but remained at thirty-five per cent. Until recently, the importers did not find out this fact, and the manufacture has continued here. But recently the importers have ascertained that they can import umbrellas at thirty-five per cent. Of course, with the duty on silk at sixty per cent., this is utterly destructive of all American manufactures of the article. It is certainly reasonable and proper that there should be the same rate of duty on the umbrellas that there is on the raw material.

In regard to the other article of spiral wire springs, there is a specific duty on iron wire; and when it is manufactured into the form of spiral springs there is an ad valorem duty; so that iron wire in the form of spiral springs can be imported cheaper than it can in the form of wire. This merely puts the same rate of duty on the springs as on the wire, and I trust there will be no objection to it.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 26) authorizing the Second Auditor to settle the accounts of officers of the Army in certain cases, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 28) for the relief of soldiers who are entitled to artificial limbs, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 27) to change the name of Moritz Juckiewicz to Morris Judd, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 25) providing for the importation into the United States of certain works of art duty free, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

DESERET.

*Mr. HOOPER, of Utah, by unanimous consent, presented the constitution of the State of Deseret; which was ordered to be referred with the accompanying papers to the Committee on Territories when appointed.

COLORADO CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to the resolution referred to the Committee on Elections in reference to the Colorado contested-election case.

The House referred to the committee certain credentials and some other papers of persons claiming seats, with instructions to report at an early day as to the prima facie right to the seat. The committee having examined the papers, recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the papers and evidence relating to the right of A. C. Hunt and George M. Chilcott to a seat in the Fortieth Congress as a Delegate from the Territory of Colorado be referred to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to report which, if either, of said claimants is entitled thereto; and that the committee have power to require the service of such notices, and grant such time for taking further evidence, as they may deem proper.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution reported by the minority of the committee.

The Clerk read the following resolution, recommended by the minority of the committee:

Resolved, That A. C. Hunt, Esq., is prima facie entitled to the seat in this House as Delegate from the Territory of Colorado, pending the contest of his right to the same by George M. Chilcott, Esq.

Mr. COOK. I ask leave to offer as a substitute the following resolution agreed upon by my colleague on the committee [Mr. Urson] and myself:

Resolved, That George M. Chilcott is prima facie entitled to the seat in this House as Delegate from the Territory of Colorado pending the contest of his right to the same by A. C. Hunt, Esq.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I offer the following amendment to the resolution reported by the majority of the committee, to come in at the end:

And pending the action of the committee and the House thereon, George M. Chilcott be sworn in as the sitting Delegate from the Territory of Colorado.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed by the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections they ask that the whole case be referred to them, with permission to examine the facts and report upon the merits of the case. It appeared by the papers which the House referred to the committee that an election was held on the 7th of August last, and the returns from the several counties were filed according to law with the secretary of the Territory. The election laws of the Territory provide that—

"The secretary of the Territory, auditor, treasurer, or any two of them, in the presence of the Governor, shall proceed * * * to canvass the votes given for all territorial officers, and the Governor shall give a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes for each office."

It appears by the papers sent to the committee by the House that on the 5th of September following the election the board of canvassers met in the presence of the Governor and canvassed the votes. The statement of the result is given in the report of the board of canvassers, signed by Frank Hall, secretary of the Territory, and Richard E. Whitsitt, auditor of the Territory. They report that they found, on counting the votes taken in the presence of the Governor, that George M. Chilcott had 3,520 votes and A. C. Hunt 3,421 votes, giving Chilcott a majority of 108. It appears, however, by the papers sent to the committee that we could go no further than the fact that the Governor, notwithstanding the board of canvassers ascertained that Chilcott had 108 majority, gave the certificate, not as the law requires, to the person having the highest number of votes, but to the person having the least number of votes, aside from the scattering.

It was alleged by the counsel for Mr. Chilcott that the committee were not bound by the certificates of the Governor, because it was not in form. They allege that inasmuch as the law requires that he should give the certificate upon the finding of the board of canvassers to the person having the highest number of votes, he should allege that fact in the certificate to show that he was authorized to give it, and inasmuch as the certificate only referred to an election and omitted all allusion to the canvass and the certificate of the canvassers, simply concluding with the words "duly elected," the certificate was insufficient, and the committee ought to report that Mr. Hunt was not entitled prima facie to the seat. The majority of the committee could not agree altogether in the views of the counsel for Chilcott.

But while the case was being argued, Mr.

Hunt introduced Governor Cumming himself, who gave the certificate, as his counsel, or his friend to argue the case. The Governor undertook to explain to the committee why no allusion was made in his certificate to the count of the canvassers. He informed us that he considered himself one of the board; that when the secretary and auditor agreed to this, the treasurer not agreeing to it, he counted himself one of the board and united with the treasurer which made a tie of the board, having no legal canvass, and therefore he was at liberty to make the certificate upon the facts as he understood them. In corroboration of the statement of Governor Cumming to the committee was the certificate of these canvassers, certified to us under the seal of the Territory, reciting that they did have a canvass in the presence of the Governor on the 5th of September, and found that Mr. Chilcott had received a majority of 108 votes.

But inasmuch as the House had sent this certificate to them with the other certificate, and it was therefore included in the resolution which required us to report who was prima facie entitled to the seat; and inasmuch as the Governor who made the certificate came before us voluntarily and stated that it was in violation of the report of the canvassers, and therefore made in violation of the law, the majority of the committee did not feel authorized to say that they were concluded by that certificate, informal as some of us believed it to be, and in conflict with the other facts presented to them.

The question then came up as to whether Mr. Chilcott was entitled to a seat on these papers. When we came to examine his certificate we found that it was given in the month of February last, by Frank Hall, the secretary and acting Governor of the Territory of Colorado. I suppose the members of the last House who are now members of this House are aware that Governor Cumming was in Washington about that time; and that while he was absent from the Territory, according to the laws of the United States and of the Territory, the secretary of the Territory becomes the acting Governor, and as such is entitled to perform all the duties of Governor for the time being. Now, in the absence of Governor Cumming, the secretary of the Territory, Mr. Hall, took the report of the board of canvassers on file in his office, and as acting Governor made a certificate, under the seal of the Territory that Mr. Chilcott, having a majority of 108 votes, was entitled to a seat in this House as Delegate from Colorado.

Now, the majority of the committee were of opinion that the power of giving a certificate having been once exercised by Governor Cumming, however wrongfully, whether in violation of the report of the board of canvassers and the laws of the Territory or not, then it could not be again exercised by some gentleman or other who might happen to be acting as Governor after that time. Therefore they came to the conclusion that from the papers before them neither of the gentlemen was prima facie entitled to a seat as Delegate from that Territory. They therefore report the resolution which has been read by the Clerk, asking that the House shall refer the whole case to them, and that they be authorized to examine, as in other contested-election cases, and determine which one of these claimants, if either, was duly elected.

Now, I suppose it would be proper for me to say that the resolution reported by the committee, as it now stands all connected together, would not perhaps receive the sanction of a majority of the members of the committee. But that sanction was made up, as I may say, by piecemeal. When the question was submitted to the vote of the committee whether Mr. Chilcott was prima facie entitled to a seat in this House as Delegate from the Territory of Colorado, there was a majority of the committee who held that he was not so entitled, and a minority who held that he was. And when the question was submitted whether Mr.

Hunt was prima facie entitled to the seat there was a majority who held that he was not, and a minority who held that he was so entitled. And had a resolution been submitted to the committee that neither of these gentlemen was entitled to the seats I suppose there would have been a majority opposed to that resolution. I have thought it proper to state this fact in exoneration of those members of the committee who appear to have concurred in the resolution of the committee, but who I see, by the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Cook,] do not propose to sustain the resolution before this House.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. PAINE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania two questions. It seems that a minority of the committee, including three of its members, have made a report in this case in favor of Mr. Hunt. Another minority of the committee, comprising two of its members, have made a report in favor of Mr. Chilcott. Now, added together, they comprise five members, or a majority of the committee. And yet we have before us another report from the same committee, which purports to come from a majority of the committee, that neither of the claimants is prima facie entitled to the seat, which, however, can have been approved by but four members of the committee. Now, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how that report can come before us as the report of the majority of the committee, when a majority of the same committee have agreed to report that one or the other of these claimants is entitled to the seat?

Mr. COOK. With the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] I will reply to the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.] Two of us on the committee were willing to concur in the report of the committee, but assented to it with the reservation that if an effort should be made by a minority of the committee to give the seat to Mr. Hunt one of us would move to amend the resolution of the minority as has been moved this morning. We deemed that no particular harm could arise from the adoption of the report of the committee, but we believed that great wrong would result if the report of the minority should prevail.

Mr. PAINE. One more question, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit. If I have correctly understood his statement, the evidence which was referred to the committee by the House, which accompanied the resolution requiring them to determine who had the prima facie right to the seat, showed that Mr. Chilcott received a majority of the votes at that election; that the lawfully-organized board of canvassers so decided in the presence of the Governor. Am I right in this?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAINE. Then I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania why, in view of that state of facts, the committee did not find that Mr. Chilcott was prima facie entitled to the seat?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I am not authorized, I suppose, to state the reasons which influenced other gentlemen in casting their votes. For myself I can say that, when we had agreed that the certificate given by the Governor was vitiated by the statement made to the committee by the Governor himself, and by the report of the board of canvassers, I did not feel warranted in falling back upon the next prima facie paper. I preferred that we should get authority from the House to examine the merits of the whole case. I presume—though we had no explanation on that point before the committee—there is an allegation that, although the returns from the several counties showed that Mr. Chilcott had one hundred and eight majority, that majority is made up in some degree of votes which were illegal. I presume, though I do not know, that this is the allegation; and therefore we preferred to hear the whole case before determining upon it any further.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman permit me to make one further remark?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. PAINE. When I voted to refer this case to the Committee of Elections to determine who had the prima facie right to a seat here, I meant to have the committee, so far as my vote could authorize it, examine all the evidence referred to them in this case, and I meant to have them decide, upon such an examination of the evidence, who is prima facie entitled to a seat here in the absence of any other proof contradicting or supporting the allegations of the respective claimants. But it seems from the gentleman's statement here that the committee have not taken this as the rule by which they were bound in determining who is entitled prima facie to a seat here. Instead of regarding themselves as obliged to look into all the evidence before them, and decide upon that evidence in the absence of other contradictory or substantiating proof, who was entitled to a seat, they have, it seems—and I ask the gentleman whether such is the fact—undertaken to find somewhere in the evidence some one single document which would in itself entitle one of the claimants to the seat, although contradicted by the other evidence in the case.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the committee had any evidence, any legal testimony before them, aside from the certificates, and if so, what was it?

Mr. SCOFIELD. We had four papers referred to us by the House. The first was a certificate of Governor Cumming in favor of Mr. Hunt; the second was the certificate of the secretary, Frank Hall, acting as Governor, in favor of Mr. Chilcott; the third was a certificate of the board of canvassers, stating the number of votes given for each candidate; and the fourth was a proclamation of Governor Cumming, stating what he had done. Those, I believe, were all the papers referred to us by the House; they are at least all I recollect. The only thing in addition to those which influenced the committee was a statement made by Governor Cumming when arguing the case for Mr. Hunt; which statement I have already detailed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether there is any law to authorize the board of canvassers to make a certificate?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will refer to the law. The election laws of the Territory provide that—

"The secretary of the Territory, auditor, treasurer, or any two of them, in the presence of the Governor, shall proceed * * * to canvass the votes given for all territorial officers, and the Governor shall give a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes for each office."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does that law authorize the board of canvassers to make a certificate which upon its face would be evidence before the committee or any court? These men are to proceed to count the votes in the presence of the Governor, and the Governor is to give a certificate of election. Is there any law authorizing or requiring these men to make any certificate of their canvass, or would such certificate be any evidence unless sworn to?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have read to the gentleman all the law I know on the subject. Perhaps it would be thought by many gentlemen that the law imposing the duty to canvass the votes for a Delegate to represent the vast interests of a young Territory would imply that they should make some kind of record of the conclusion to which they came; that it should not be carried around in their memory or to be given in parole, to be forgotten as soon as the breath cooled with which it was uttered. That is to be determined by each gentleman for himself. I understand the word "canvass" to mean to examine as well as to count. I suppose, without having looked at the definition of the word, it authorized these men to scrutinize the returns and to see whether they were right; I mean the returns from the several counties. They added up the votes and announced to the Governor the conclusion to which they came, and thereupon the Governor should give the certificate to the person having the highest number of votes. That is the opinion I have of it.

I am not here to advocate the right of Mr. Chilcott to a seat as a Delegate or Mr. Hunt. I stand by the position of the committee which I represent here: that is to authorize the committee to examine all of the facts, to go back of the board of canvassers, and to report which one of these gentlemen was duly elected by having the highest number of legal votes. I now yield to the minority of the committee.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to occupy a moment in reference to the reports of the committee from the majority and minority on this contested-election case. Having been unable to agree to the report of the majority, and having signed the report of the minority, it is perhaps due to the person interested, the person claiming the seat as a Delegate here, and whom the minority of the committee report is prima facie entitled to a seat—it is, perhaps, due to him that I should say a word concerning this case and the report of the majority of the committee.

This matter, sir, was referred to the Committee of Elections with directions to make a report which of these parties was prima facie entitled to a seat upon this floor. What, Mr. Speaker, is the fair meaning of that direction? What were the committee bound to understand they were set to do by this resolution of the House? I understand the law in reference to the meaning of this term "prima facie entitled to a seat" to be which of these parties presents regular credentials. If neither of them has regular or formal credentials according to the law, then neither of them is entitled prima facie to a seat. If one has credentials which according to the law are regular and formal upon their face and the other has not, then the one who has received the formal credentials is the one entitled to a seat; and the committee under this resolution thought it had no right to go behind the papers themselves to hear any evidence, that it had no right to hear any testimony in regard to what the facts were in relation to who had the majority of votes or who had not.

Mr. Hunt, who claimed to be entitled to a seat on this floor as Delegate for the Territory of Colorado, presented credentials that were signed by the Governor of that Territory. By the organic law of Congress establishing that Territory, and also by the law of the Territory itself, the Governor is made the certifying officer of the election of Delegates, and no other officer has any right, power, or authority to give a certificate.

Now, the first question would be, whether the certificate of the Governor itself is sufficient, whether it is formal, whether the legal value of that paper upon its face entitles it to be termed credentials. The objection to it was that he did not in terms say that Mr. Hunt, to whom he gave the certificate, had a majority of the votes; but he did say that he was duly elected; and that, in my judgment, is equivalent to saying that he had a majority of the votes cast. If he had not he could not be duly elected; and as I understand it, this is the approved form in which credentials of members of Congress from all the States of the Union have uniformly or generally been sent here.

But I need not stop to make any argument upon that point, because upon that the majority of the committee were agreed. The majority have reported that neither of the claimants is entitled prima facie to a seat. They say that the certificate which was given to Mr. Hunt is sufficiently legal and formal upon its face. How happens it, then, that the conclusion of the majority of the committee has been arrived at? Why, they say that Mr. Hunt, not content to rest his claim upon the strength of that paper itself, "introduced Governor Cumming in its support." Now, although that may in one sense be true, yet in substance it is not true. The fair meaning of the language used by the committee upon this subject is that he was introduced as a witness, was introduced to testify to something, or to say something in support of that certificate which the certificate itself does not contain. That is not true in point of fact. Governor Cumming came before us declaring that he appeared simply and solely as counsel to argue the question of law presented on the face of these credentials in favor of Mr. Hunt, to whom he had given the certificate. Therefore it is not true, as the fair meaning of the language, that Governor Cumming was introduced to give information to the committee which was not conveyed to them by the papers themselves. He appeared before us as any lawyer would come with his client to argue the question presented upon the face of the papers, which was the only question that we had to decide.

In the course of his argument questions were put to him by members of the committee in relation to what the facts were. Now, Mr. Speaker, in my judgment we had no right to put any such question if we had called Governor Cumming upon the stand as a witness and had him sworn as such under the resolution of the House, for we had no right to hear a word of testimony from him or anybody else. We were confined by the resolution under which this case was submitted to us by the House to these papers, and these alone; and when the committee go aside from them and say they undertook to decide this question upon what Governor Cumming said, it is an entire departure from their duty under the resolution under which they were acting.

There is an unfortunate difference of opinion, as well as a difference of recollection, between the members of the committee in relation to what Governor Cumming did say. My own recollection is that he did not say any such thing as the majority of the committee say he did; but inasmuch as we differ in relation to that, and the recollection of the majority of the committee is different from mine, I will not attempt to say which of us is right in reference to that. The point is, no matter what Governor Cumming said, we had no right to hear him say anything on the subject except what he chose to say in his argument as an opinion in relation to the letter. It was sufficient for us to say who had the paper evidence, who had what the law required as credentials to entitle him to the seat as Delegate. It cannot be pretended that anybody but Mr. Hunt had any credentials at all. Nothing can be found, either in the organic law or in the laws of the Territory itself, giving to anybody but the Governor the right to sign the certificate. Neither the secretary nor the treasurer nor the auditor who were authorized to aid in counting the votes were entitled to give credentials. Now, the only person entitled by any law to certify the election to us is the Governor of the Territory himself.

Well, it is said that this Mr. Hall undertook to make a certificate as acting Governor of the Territory. Sir, what does the law mean when it says, "The Governor shall certify?" It means the Governor for the time being. It does not mean the Governor for last year or the Governor for the next year, but the Governor at the time of the transaction, the current Governor if I may use the expression.

It seems to me, therefore, that under the resolution of the House sending this case to us, merely for us to determine upon the face of the papers sent to us who had the prima facie title to the seat, the very fact that is reported by the majority of the committee, that Mr. Hunt had a certificate from the Governor which was legal and sufficient upon its face, is an end of this preliminary inquiry. I agree that it is not in a legal sense conclusive; that we may go behind that certificate for proof when the case comes to be heard before the committee upon its merits. We can then take other testimony; and this paper presented by Mr. Chilcott as his credentials may perhaps be regarded as proper proof upon which the committee may act in deciding the final case. But as credentials upon the preliminary investigation the paper is of no value at all, because the law does not invest the officer who made it with any authority whatever to make a certificate to take the place of credentials here or anywhere else.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] state to the House which one of these claimants had the majority of the votes polled, so far as it appeared before the committee?

Mr. POLAND. We had no evidence on that subject.

Mr. MILLER. Did not the certificate of the board of canvassers state that fact?

Mr. POLAND. That certificate was not before us as evidence.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not suppose the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] means to say that the report of the board of canvassers, officially signed and certified under the seal of the Territory, was not before the committee; but the gentleman means that the result of the canvass of that board was not evidence before the committee.

Mr. POLAND. The paper signed by the secretary and auditor of the Territory of Colorado was presented to the committee by Mr. Chilcott as part of his credentials. The chairman of the Committee of Elections [Mr. DAVES] announced to the parties when they appeared before us that the committee would not receive any evidence; but that we were merely to receive the papers produced and put forward as credentials. One of the claimants produced the certificate of the Governor of the Territory that he, Mr. Hunt, was duly elected. The other claimant, Mr. Chilcott, produced a certificate signed by the secretary and the auditor of the Territory that he had received a majority of the votes cast.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I am not certain what the chairman of the committee may have said to the claimants, nor is it important. But whatever authority was conveyed by the language of the resolution of the House referring this matter to the committee that authority the committee had. That resolution directed that all the papers relating to the election of Delegate from the Territory of Colorado—not the papers relating to the certificate, but all the papers relating to the election of delegate—should be referred to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to report at an early day as to which claimant, if either, had a prima facie right to a seat.

Mr. POLAND. I understand that by the resolution of the House we had referred to us the credentials of each of these claimants, or what was claimed to be credentials. We were not instructed at all to go into an examination of the facts and determine anything about who had the most votes. This paper signed by the secretary and auditor of the Territory of Colorado was before us, and was presented by one of these claimants as part of his credentials.

Now, the only question we had to decide was whether the paper thus presented was credentials or not, or was better credentials than the one presented by the other claimant. In my judgment it was no credentials at all. Whether it is evidence to be considered upon an investigation of the merits of the case, when it comes before us for determination, is altogether another affair. It was not laid before us as any such evidence, but as the credentials of the person claiming the seat. The only question for us to determine was which one of these claimants, if either of them, has legal credentials. In my judgment one of them has no credentials at all. The paper he presents as credentials is no better than credentials signed by me or by any other member of this House. The other gentleman has credentials which I regard as legal in form, signed by the officer authorized by law to sign it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Cook.]

Mr. COOK. Inasmuch as I have come to a conclusion directly the reverse of that which has been adopted by my colleague upon the Committee of Elections, the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] I desire to state to the House in a few words the reasons which have influenced me in arriving at that conclusion. I believe, as that gentleman does, that the Committee of Elections were directed by the House to determine which of these claimants had a prima facie right to a seat here as Delegate from the Territory of Colorado, and who should be allowed to occupy the seat until the final determination of the case. I believe that the papers and the facts which were proper to be considered by that committee do show that Mr. Chilcott has the prima facie right to a seat; and I think I can defend that proposition. Before proceeding, however, to do so, I wish to give my view of the facts appearing before the committee which have been commented upon by my colleague on the committee, [Mr. POLAND.]

The gentleman says that nothing was properly before the committee, nothing could properly be considered by the committee, except the papers which were referred to us and which we had in our hands. My judgment is different. The parties came before the committee claiming seats in this House by virtue of this election, and they were represented also by their respective counsel. Governor Cumming, who was the counsel of Mr. Hunt, made on the part of Mr. Hunt admissions which I contend bind him as effectually as though made by himself. It is true that a certain paper presented was claimed to constitute the credentials of Mr. Hunt; but in presenting that paper Governor Cumming made such a statement of facts as in my judgment rendered the paper of no validity whatever. Governor Cumming admitted that this paper was given in direct contravention of the finding of the board of canvassers of the Territory who canvassed the votes cast for the candidates for Delegate; that the majority of the board of canvassers decided that Mr. Chilcott had received a majority of one hundred and eight; and that he (Governor Cumming) had taken it upon himself, in contravention of the decision of the board of canvassers, to give the certificate to Mr. Hunt.

It is said that Governor Cumming was not sworn as a witness and could give no evidence before the committee. But, Mr. Speaker, he could make an admission; and he did do so before the committee. If a man should come into court with a note of hand, that note might be prima facie evidence of good cause of action; but if he should admit that that note of hand was a forgery or had been stolen, I apprehend it would destroy his cause of action. I look upon this paper of Mr. Hunt, with the accompanying admission of Governor Cumming, very much in this light.

Now, sir, I desire to say something upon the question whether this paper presented by Mr. Hunt was valid upon its face. I protest against the argument which is attempted to be drawn from the fact that this certificate is substantially like those given to members-elect from many of the States. The argument is not a fair one, and I will state the reason. We provided by law two years ago what should be the form and character of certificates given to those elected members of this House; and by that law we directed the Clerk of the House to place upon his roll the names of men who had certificates embracing certain facts. When a man claims his seat as a member, and presents such a certificate in accordance with that law of Congress, that certificate is of course prima facie evidence of his right to a seat.

Mr. POLAND. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether the form of credentials for members of the House was not the same before the passage of that statute as it has been since, and whether the statute was not passed for the very purpose of meeting a difficulty that had arisen in relation to the accepted form of credentials of members of the House.

Mr. COOK. I have not time to answer that question as fully as I would wish to do; but I will say that the form of certificate of a man claiming a seat as a member from a State is prescribed in the law. A Delegate from a Territory stands upon an entirely different footing. The law does not prescribe what shall be the form of the certificate of a person claiming a seat as a Delegate.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. COOK. My colleague on the committee must excuse me. I cannot yield now.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to say a word of explanation.

Mr. COOK. I presume the gentleman will have an opportunity after I get through to say what he desires; I cannot yield at present.

Now, sir, under what circumstances can the Governor of the Territory certify that a man is elected a Delegate from that Territory to this House under these circumstances, when the secretary of the Territory, auditor, treasurer, or any two of them, in the presence of the Governor, shall canvass the votes given for Delegate, the Governor shall give a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes? Then the Governor can give a certificate to the man who has the highest number of votes.

I wish to call the attention of the House to this fact: that the Governor, in the discharge of this duty, is in the exercise of a limited special jurisdiction, and not in the discharge of any duty like that of a court of general jurisdiction, where the presumption would be in favor of the legality of his acts. He is in discharge of limited special jurisdiction, and must confine himself distinctly within the limits of the authority conferred upon him by the statute, and that authority must appear affirmatively in every step taken in the matter.

Now, what authority had this Governor? He had the authority to give a certificate to the man who had the highest number of votes after the board of canvassers should have determined by an actual canvass how many votes had been cast for each candidate, and he had no other authority. By his own admission, made before the committee, he has given his certificate to the man whom the board of canvassers has determined has the minority of votes by one hundred and eight. I say that he has not only no authority to give a certificate to a person whom the board of canvassers had determined was not elected, but that the certificate should show upon its face that the authority was exercised in conformity with the law conferring it. He has a right to give a certificate under certain circumstances, and that certificate should show the facts to exist upon which the right to give it depended.

If he had the right to give this certificate, if it is prima facie evidence of the election of the person who holds it, it would have been prima facie evidence of the same fact if it had not shown that any election had taken place, if it simply said, "Sir, you are elected a Delegate to Congress." If we may dispense with one condition-precedent, we may dispense with all of them. The result is as precisely illustrated in this case, the Governor may give a certificate on his own motion to a man whom the people have rejected, to a man certified by the regular election officers to have received a minority of the votes cast at this election.

There are two questions to be determined. The first is, ought it to appear upon this certificate that the Governor has acted in conformity to law in giving it? Ought the facts which must exist to authorize the Governor to give it to appear upon it? It does not appear that the Governor had any right to give it, because the law of the Territory, construed in connection with the organic law, provides that the board of canvassers shall determine who has received the majority of votes. That certificate does not show that the board of canvassers have ever acted. The evidence shows that they did act, and that Mr. Chilcott received a majority of the votes. If it need not be shown by the certificate what person received the majority of votes as found by the board of canvassers, then nothing ing need appear except the statement, "Sir, you are elected a Delegate." By this construction the law of the Territory is set aside and rendered nugatory. How does it protect the rights of the people, how does it furnish evidence to the man really elected, if indeed the Governor may disregard the finding of the board of canvassers, or if his certificate need show nothing in relation to it?

The second question is, does this certificate show the law has been complied with? If it be admitted that the certificate ought to show existence of facts necessary to entitle the holder to a seat in this House according to law, then does this certificate show that the law has been complied with. Here is the law:

"Sec. 36. The secretary of the Territory, auditor, treasurer, or any two of them, in the presence of the Governor, shall proceed within fifty days after the election, and sooner if all the returns be received, to canvass the votes given for all territorial officers, and the Governor shall give a certificate of election to the persons having the highest number of votes for each office. In case there shall be no choice, by reason of any two or more persons having an equal number of votes for the same office, the Governor shall call a special election in the manner provided in this act."

What does that mean? It means the Governor shall give a certificate to the man who has been found by the board of canvassers to have the highest number of votes. That is exactly what it means. No man will contend that it means anything else. This certificate, in order to show a compliance with the law, must show that it is given to the man found by the board of canvassers to have the highest number of votes. But it does not show anything of the sort. It shows, taken together with the admission before us, which must be considered as a part of this case, that it was given to a man who had the minority of the votes. It therefore does not comply with the law, and it is not prima facie evidence of a right to a seat in this House.

It is said that the "current" Governor, to use the expression of the gentleman from Vermont, must give the certificate. Suppose the Governor dies the next day after the election, will it be contended that no certificate can be given by his legal successor? I take it that position would not be assumed.

Mr. BLAINE. Suppose he gave it before he died.

Mr. COOK. I will come to that. The proposition I am discussing is whether a certificate must be given by the man whom my colleague on the committee calls the "current" Governor, and the answer must be if the Governor has not given the certificate required by law his successor may do it. But the question is put to me: suppose the power is exhausted. That is a pertinent question. If the power is exhausted, then I grant it cannot be exercised by any subsequent Governor. But what exhausts the power? Giving a certificate which is prima facie evidence of a right to a seat exhausts the power. The power is not exhausted by giving to a man something which is no certificate of election. I submit to my friend from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] who propounded the question to me, that if this Governor had certified some scrap of poetry, for instance that which was sent to us by the late Commissioner of Public Buildings, it would not have exhausted the power to give a certificate, nor would it have prevented his successor from giving one.

Did Governor Cumming exhaust the power? Did he ever give a legal or valid certificate of election? If he did not, he did not exhaust the power. I hold that he did not, consequently a second certificate of election given by the secretary of the Territory in due form of law certifying that the votes had been canvassed, and by the board of canvassers it was determined that one man had received so many votes and the other so many, and that the majority in favor of Chilcott was one hundred and eight, is prima facie evidence of the right of Mr. Chilcott to a seat.

I do not well see how it can be that when one certificate is positively good beyond all doubt we can say that neither has a prima facie right to a seat in this House. If the first certificate is legal, it gives the holder the right to the seat. But the fact of the first certificate not being in compliance with the law, taken in connection with the admission before us which shows that it was given in direct contravention of law, does not show a prima facie right to the seat on the part of the Delegate holding the certificate, and consequently Mr. Chilcott, who received a majority of the votes according to the decision of the regularly-constituted tribunal, the board of canvassers, has the prima facie right, and ought to be admitted to a seat on this floor, while the Committee of Elections is investigating the question and determining upon evidence to be taken which of them was really elected by the people. We ought not, in my opinion, to give such construction to this certificate as to make it prima facie evidence of matters not stated in it and which did not exist, that is, that Mr. Hunt had received a majority ascertained in the manner provided by law, and thus to defeat the right, allow a man not elected to take a seat on this floor, allow the Governor to nullify the law of the Territory, the action of the board of canvassers, and the will of the people.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the duty of the House in this case is perfectly apparent. I do not agree with the minority of the committee in their report, that Mr. Hunt should have the seat; still less do I agree with a smaller minority of the committee that Mr. Chilcott should have it. The majority report is that there is good ground for declaring that neither one has a prima facie right to the seat. Now, if we sustain that report, we certainly do no injustice to either of the parties. We do not admit Mr. Hunt to the prejudice of Mr. Chilcott, nor the latter to the prejudice of the former.

In so far as the mere prima facie goes on the question of the certificate of Governor Cumming, on a careful reading of it all I have to say is that it resembles as nearly as I can remember three certificates on which I have taken my seat for three successive terms in this House. And in answer to the gentleman from Illinois I will say that I think a certificate given for a member of the House ought to be good for a Delegate from a Territory. I say, however, that there is enough evidence here to raise at the threshold a doubt of Mr. Hunt's right to a seat, and that doubt being of a serious nature he should not be sworn in. But the majority of the committee stopped there and told us, after an examination, that neither of these claimants had a prima facie right to the seat; and that neither party will be prejudiced by allowing each of the claimants to serve on the other a notice of contest, and giving a full and definite hearing by the committee before the House shall act finally upon this question.

Now, I do ask my Republican and Union friends here, with whom I concur, not to allow party prejudice to come into this case. Both of these claimants have rights; they have the right to be heard fairly and fully before the Committee of Elections of this House, and then before the House itself, and I submit that the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] to give Mr. Chilcott a seat here, is to preclude this case at the outset against the submitted report of the committee. Now, I do not think this House as an impartial body can afford to do any such thing. I hope, therefore, that the report of the Committee of Elections will be sustained.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR.]

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I shall take but a short time to present my views upon this case. I have no interest in this case, except the attainment of a just and legal result upon the question referred to the Committee of Elections. I feel no personal interest whatever in the contest for this seat.

I understand the objection to the claim of Mr. Hunt to a seat in this House as Delegate from the Territory of Colorado to rest mainly upon this fact: not that his certificate is invalid, informal, incomplete, or insufficient as evidence of a prima facie right to the seat, but that Governor Cumming, who issued that certificate, came before our committee and made certain statements in reference to the right of Mr. Hunt to this seat. Now, on that point I only desire to say this: that there was no evidence referred to our committee at all. As my distinguished colleague on the committee [Mr. POLAND] has said, the simple question referred to us was which of these gentlemen upon the credentials offered by them respectively was prima facie entitled to the seat. That excludes the idea that we should go into an examination of parole evidence, or of witnesses, for the purpose of determining the right to the seat.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COOK] says that the Governor of the Territory came before our committee and made certain admissions. Suppose he did make certain admissions before the committee, of what value or weight are those admissions? Every lawyer here knows that if those admissions are of value at all they are of value as evidence; and if those admissions came before us at all in a way to be taken cognizance of by us they came before us as testimony; yet we had no right to consider any testimony, and we did not assume to consider any; under the resolution of the House it would have been exceeding our authority to attempt any such investigation.

But it is claimed that the certificate presented by Mr. Hunt does not state facts sufficient to entitle him prima facie to a seat as Delegate. Now, what does that certificate state? I beg leave to call the attention of gentlemen upon the other side to the fact that the certificate states in express terms the existence of every fact necessary to sustain the right of Mr. Hunt to a seat here. It does not state, it is true, that an election was held on a certain day and that at that election a certain number of votes was cast for Mr. Hunt in this precinct, a certain number in that precinct, a certain number in another precinct, and so on. But it does state that "in accordance with the laws of Congress and the laws of the Territory of Colorado, Mr. Hunt was duly elected a Delegate to the Fortieth Congress from the Territory of Colorado."

I submit, viewing this matter as a lawyer, and in no other light than as a mere question of law, which in truth it is, it is clear almost beyond controversy that Mr. Hunt has the prima facie right to the seat; for it is utterly impossible that the recitals in this certificate shall be true and yet that Mr. Hunt shall not have received the highest number of votes. If he was duly elected a Delegate Mr. Chilcott could not have been elected at all. The language of this certificate excludes the conclusion that any other person than Mr. Hunt had the highest number of votes, or that the election was irregular, or that the certificate itself was prematurely, corruptly, or fraudulently issued. In form the certificate is almost a copy of the one by which I hold my seat on this floor, and very few gentlemen here hold any more formally perfect credentials. It substantially follows the requirement of both the law of Congress and the law of the Territory. It was executed and attested as required by law.

It is contended that Governor Cumming came before us and made certain admissions. Upon this point I desire to say there is a singular lack of harmony among the members of the committee with regard to the facts as they transpired before us. I am entirely certain that I heard no admissions of this kind made by Governor Cumming. I am also entirely certain that when Governor Cumming was called upon before our committee to state the facts on the point in question he expressly refused to do so, saying that that was not the time or the occasion for going into a statement or investigation of the facts. He expressly declined to appear before our committee in the capacity of a witness in any sense whatever; and he also went so far as to say that whatever he might have stated in regard to the facts he desired to withdraw. I say further that on that occasion he said in so many words that by the result of the election Mr. Hunt was duly elected a Delegate, and had received the clear majority of the votes, and was entitled to the seat. If, therefore, he did make the admissions alleged, let us take all his statements together, as a plain principle of common sense and of law requires, and give Hunt as well as Chilcott the benefit of them, if such irrelevant matters must be brought into this controversy at this stage.

Mr. COOK. With the consent of my colleague on the committee, I will ask him a single question. When Governor Cumming said that he declined to go into the question of fact, was not that remark made in reply to a question of the chairman of the committee as to the reason which had induced him to give a certificate contrary to the finding of the board of canvassers?

Mr. KERR. My impression is that the remark was made in reply to an inquiry addressed to him by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. UPSON,] and not in reply to a question of the chairman of the committee. It is immaterial, however, from what source the question came. I simply state my recollection of the fact as it transpired before the committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that upon the papers referred to the committee Mr. Hunt is entitled to be sworn in and to occupy the seat pending the further contest, according to the legal method of procedure of his right. And I am strengthened in this conviction by the view which I take of the duties of the territorial Governor under the law. I hold that in this respect the territorial Governor possesses precisely the same rights and the same powers, and is required to perform precisely the same duty as the Governor of a State in the case of a member-elect to this House. He is required to perform simply a ministerial duty, that of issuing a certificate of election to the person duly elected to the office. That duty the territorial Governor in this case has discharged. He has issued this certificate. In doing this, he exhausted the power conferred upon him by law. There remained no residuum of power that could be exercised by any other officer. There could be but one Governor of Colorado competent to act upon this question. He was the Governor, and he performed that duty; and in doing so he exhausted the power. How, then, could another gentleman who might under the law become temporarily entitled to act as Governor attempt to undo that which he had done, to set aside his certificate and issue another? Frank Hall, who issued the certificate five months afterward to Mr. Chilcott, and styled himself "secretary of state and acting Governor," does not explain how he became acting Governor; nor does it appear why he, five months before, when all the facts were fresh in his memory, attested and countersigned the certificate of Mr. Hunt, as secretary of the Territory. The whole proceeding on his part involves him in such inconsistencies as are entirely inexplicable, except after a full examination of the case upon the evidence and the merits. His conduct has very much the appearance of having been prompted by some political exigency.

It may be said that the acting Governor discovered from the facts presented to him that the first certificate was prematurely issued or that it was even wrongfully or corruptly issued, and that under these circumstances it became his duty to correct the error. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this would be an erroneous interpretation to place upon the duties of this officer. I insist that if a wrong of that kind was committed by the Governor the acting Governor could not remedy it in this way. I hold that the facts constituting such a wrong would afford the material for a successful contest of the right of the claimant, and that those facts should be presented to this House in the nature of evidence on an examination and trial of the case upon its full merits, but not upon a mere prima facie inquiry as to the sufficiency of credentials. What the facts upon such an examination may prove to be I am wholly uninformed.

It is said the committee is somewhat embarrassed by the fact there is also a return of the board of canvassers in this matter. Well, there is a return of what purports to be of a portion of that board, but that cannot be considered a credential. It could only be presented to our committee for consideration in the nature of evidence, or as a part of Mr. Chilcott's prima facie case. No depositions or testimony or parole evidence came to us under this inquiry. It will not do to say that if a notary public, in performing the functions of his office in this city, should make a certificate which should be offered in a court of justice as evidence of certain facts stated in it, the President of the United States could come into that court of justice and say that the commission to that notary was fraudulently or wrongfully issued, and that his official act is null and void. Certainly that could not be done, because the court could only judge of the sufficiency of that act of the notary public as a mere prima facie case. The court could not go behind the record to inquire in that preliminary way whether proper acts had preceded the making of the certificate of that notary public or not. It is attempted in this case to violate that simple rule of law. I submit it cannot with any propriety be done.

I wish to say one word more in conclusion. I have not any particular personal objection to the adoption of the report of the majority. I do not know that it will much injure either of these parties. I submit this minority report in company with others, because I feel it to be my duty to do so.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to ask the gentleman one question, and that is whether the evidence before the committee did not fully establish that Mr. Chilcott had one hundred and eight majority of the votes cast, and whether there was any evidence to contravene that?

Mr. KERR. Do you address that to me?

Mr. MYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERR. Then my answer is that there is not a solitary scintilla of evidence of the facts stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania; not one particle, as I understand it. But the very contrary; that Mr. Hunt had a majority of the votes, and was duly elected.

Mr. MYERS. I find in the report submitted by the majority of the committee that the board of canvassers returned that Mr. Chilcott had received one hundred and eight majority, but that the Governor gave the certificate to Mr. Hunt, who had no majority. He said he was duly elected, but he does not follow out the law and say he had the highest number of votes. It is admitted, both in the minority and majority reports, that the evidence is that the board of canvassers certify Mr. Chilcott received one hundred and eight majority; and that will determine my vote in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa to admit Mr. Chilcott to the seat to which he is prima facie entitled.

Mr. KERR. I wish to make a short reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I have said there was no such evidence before the committee, and I repeat it. This pretended return of the board of canvassers was not introduced as evidence at all. It was introduced, if at all, by Mr. Chilcott as part of his credentials. If he had introduced certificates like that one, I say they would have no legal force before this House in this preliminary inquiry.

The gentleman says the return of the board of canvassers shows that Mr. Chilcott had a majority. I say it is not necessary any certificate should show that. The law only requires one of the contestants shall have the highest number of votes cast. Neither is required to have a majority.

Mr. MYERS. The highest number of votes.

Mr. KERR. Now, then, suppose the certificate of the Governor had followed the language of the law and certified that Mr. Hunt had received the highest number of votes, which might not have been an absolute majority of those cast, for there may have been a number of candidates: in accordance with the law of Congress, and in accordance with the law of the Territory of Colorado, Mr. Hunt then would have been duly elected a Delegate to the Fortieth Congress.

Now, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he can imagine that the facts stated in Mr. Hunt's certificate can be true, and yet that it can also be true that Mr. Chilcott received the highest number of votes?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I cannot yield further to my colleague, [Mr. MYERS,] I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.]

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I take it that this case, like most other legal cases, depends upon getting right definitions. The question that was to be tried by the Committee of Elections was as to who had the prima facie right to a seat. Now, sir, what does that mean?

First, the committee have dealt with it as meaning that they should ascertain who had such a paper as was provided by the law to show the party to have been elected. If that is what prima facie meant in your resolution, then the majority of the committee were right in disposing of it in that view and holding that neither party had given to the committee such a paper as entitled them to report that he had a good title to start with.

Now, I will waive the question whether the certificate signed by the Governor and presented by Mr. Hunt would be good under the law on its own face. I will admit that it would be a good certificate, a matter about which I have very serious doubts, however. Then I invite my fellow-members to this idea, and it is about all the idea I wish to present. My colleague on the committee [Mr. POLAND] says that the committee were stopped short in their investigation by seeing a paper laid before them which looked like a good paper under the law, and that they could not look beyond that. Now, that may do very well, it seems to me—and I submit it with deference—in a trial of a horse case or something of that kind, but it strikes me as strange law when an American Congress is inquiring whether a man is entitled to take a seat under the laws of Congress in this House. It is too narrow.

I put it to my friend what he would do in a case like this: suppose Mr. Hunt had come before the Committee of Elections and said, "I procured that certificate by a larceny," would my friend stop short and say the Committee of Elections are bound to say that that paper was good enough under the laws and made a prima facie case? Or suppose he had said it was a forgery, would my friend say that the committee, having that fact confessed before them, were bound to report to the House of Representatives that it was a good prima facie case because the certificate read right on its face? Now, it seems to me, it is not characterizing it too severely to say that that is not very sound law, logic, or sense.

Well, sir, what did happen in this case? Why, just this, according to what seems to be confessed, though I was not present at the meeting, and therefore only state the facts as they were stated to me in the committee afterward, when I was present: it was admitted that under the law authorizing three men to make a canvass, and authorizing the Governor, who was to stand by and see it done, to give a certificate of election, two of the canvassers concurring in making a report, and the third did not, whereupon the Governor and this third man made a count utterly in violation and defiance of law, upon which count the Governor gave a certificate to the man who was thus declared, in violation and defiance of law, to have the majority of votes.

Now, I would like to know whether the Committee of Elections are bound to take cognizance of no fact like that stated and confessed right in the committee-room, that a certificate was procured in direct, acknowledged palpable fraud of the law, and whether we are to give legal significance to a certificate in the face of such an admission. If we are, then, according to the admission I made in the outset, Mr. Hunt is entitled to the seat. If not, then there is no prima facie case; because the paper is the same as stolen or procured by forgery or fraud. There is nothing, therefore, under the law making a prima facie case.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I yield a few minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this case was sent to the Committee of Elections by a resolution, which directed all the papers filed in the case to go to that committee. The papers were—first, the certificate of Governor Cumming that Mr. Hunt was duly elected a Delegate from the Territory of Colorado; second, the certificate of the board of canvassers that Mr. Chilcott had received a majority of all the votes cast at that election for Delegate; third, the certificate of the acting Governor of the Territory that Mr. Chilcott had been duly elected; and fourth, the authenticated returns from the several counties of the Territory giving the same result that was ascertained by the board of canvassers of the Territory. I find nothing said in the report of the committee about the latter class of papers, though they were all sent to the committee by order of the House.

Having this case before them upon these papers, the Committee of Elections have not been able to present to this House a conclusion as to which one of these claimants is prima facie entitled to the seat. The case, therefore, comes back to the House in the same condition in which it went to the Committee of Elections. And we are now to consider it upon the same papers and evidence that the House referred it to the committee.

It is not my purpose to find fault with the action of either the majority or the minority of the Committee of Elections. They may settle their differences of opinion among themselves. I propose to treat the case as though it were originally before the House, and without regard to the action of the committee; for we have no particular light given us by the committee, and we may safely and properly treat the case as though it had never been referred.

Now, what do we find? We find that Mr. Hunt presents a certificate of the Governor to the effect that he had been duly elected Delegate from the Territory of Colorado. But we also find in the case the certificate of the board of canvassers upon which, by the terms of the law, the Governor of the Territory was required to base his certificate of the fact of election, for he is required to certify the result found by the canvassers. That paper is now here as a part of the case. When we compare the certificate of the Governor with the paper upon which by law he was bound to base it, we find that the certificate is false. The result, as certified by the board of canvassers, is that of all the votes cast for Delegate to Congress George M. Chilcott received a majority of one hundred and eight. Yet, in the face of that report of the board of canvassers, which the law requires the Governor to follow, he certifies that Mr. Hunt was duly elected; that is, though Mr. Hunt has but a minority of the votes cast, the Governor certifies that he was duly elected. This destroys the certificate of the Governor, and leaves Mr. Hunt without any evidence of title to the contested seat.

What further do we find? We find among the papers filed by Mr. Chilcott with the Clerk of this House, and directed by the House to be sent with the other papers to the Committee of Elections, the authenticated election returns from the several counties of the Territory. It was upon the returns from the counties that the territorial board of canvassers were to act, and upon which they did act. Looking into those returns from the several counties, and adding up the votes for Mr. Chilcott and the votes for Mr. Hunt, as therein exhibited, we find that they show a majority of one hundred and eight votes for Mr. Chilcott. The board of canvassers of the Territory, acting in pursuance of law upon these county returns, ascertained the result that I have mentioned—that Mr. Chilcott had a majority of one hundred and eight votes. The county canvassers and the territorial canvassers exactly agree; and the certificate of the latter officers follows the finding returns of the former officers. Thus, the certificate of the territorial canvassers is supported by the authenticated returns from the several counties. And that is the case on the part of Mr. Chilcott, and no one can doubt his right to the seat except upon the ground that a fraudulent certificate of a Governor is better evidence of title than an ascertained majority of votes which stands in conflict with it.

Now, it has been said by the gentleman who represents the majority of the Committee of Elections that it has been alleged, or probably will be alleged, that there was illegal voting at the election for Delegate. Of course that matter cannot be considered by us at this time. That is a matter which belongs to the contest which the resolution proposes shall proceed between the two claimants for this seat. But inasmuch as there has been a little traveling beyond the record in that direction, I may say, on the other hand, that it may be alleged, and is affirmed, that before the canvass by the territorial officers was completed Governor Cumming asserted that he did not care what the canvassers might find, for he had determined to give the certificate to Mr. Hunt in any event. That this was the determination of the Governor is proved by the papers which we have before us, and on which we are now acting. These papers disclose that he did give the certificate to Mr. Hunt in violation of the finding of the board of canvassers, which he by law was bound to follow.

I only speak of this because of the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTFIELD,] that it may be alleged that the majority for Mr. Chilcott, as returned by the board of canvassers, was made up, at least in part, of illegal votes. And I may further say, that finding this majority of one hundred and eight had found its lodgment in the office of the secretary of the Territory before the day of the canvass, through the returns sent up from the several counties, the Governor and some of Mr. Hunt's friends immediately telegraphed for the removal of the secretary (who was a fair and just officer, and who stood in the way of the fraud contemplated) prior to the date fixed by law for the canvass, of the votes by the territorial officers. This was during the time when the presidential party was "swinging round the circle." But, sir, this is all outside of the case, as well as outside of the record; and I only mention it because of the remark made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

I ask the House to pass upon this case, not according to the view presented by the gentlemen representing the minority of the committee, regarding this simply as a question whether the certificate given by Governor Cumming follows the law in its language, requirements, and form. I ask the House to act upon the case as it appears before us from all of the papers filed by the two claimants. When we come to determine the case upon these papers we find that, instead of Mr. Hunt having a prima facie case by virtue of the certificate given by the Governor, he is asking for admission on a document which is proved to be false by the other papers filed in the case, papers made in pursuance of law, and which it was the duty of the Governor to follow.

Let me make one further remark in support of the amendment I have offered. During the Thirty-Ninth Congress both Houses declared that the people of Colorado had so far advanced in the establishment of a permanent community and the development of the resources at their command as to be entitled to representation in both Houses—a Representative in this Hall and two Senators at the other end of the Capitol; in other words, that Colorado ought to be a State. That was the judgment of Congress with regard to the importance of the constituency which these claimants claim title to represent in this body. It seems to me that justice to this important constituency demands the present admission of one of these claimants pending the contest between them. The resolution of the committee without the amendment which I have submitted would, if adopted, leave the people of Colorado without any representative here until the end of the contest shall have been reached. This would be unfair and unjust. I therefore ask the House to adopt the amendment I have offered, that Mr. Chilcott shall be sworn in as the sitting Delegate pending the action of the committee and the House upon this case; and I ask this because the papers and evidence before us show conclusively that Mr. Chilcott is entitled to the seat by virtue of his having received a majority of the votes cast by the people of Colorado.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. UPSON.]

Mr. UPSON. Mr. Speaker, I concur with the view so well presented by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. COOK,] and consider that Mr. Chilcott has the prima facie right to the seat, according to the papers referred to the committee. This view of the case has been so clearly exhibited by the gentleman from Illinois, and also by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] that I would not say a word on the question, but that, as allusion has been made, somewhat irregularly perhaps, to the proceedings that took place before the committee, it may be advisable for me to say a word in verification or corroboration of what has been stated by my colleague.

The action of the Governor of Colorado in this case, as evidenced on the face of the papers, and by his own declarations before the committee, appears to me a gross outrage upon the rights of the people of that Territory, committed in direct defiance of their expressed will through the ballot-box; and I shall not believe, until it shall be evidenced by a deliberate vote, that this House will consent to ratify this outrageous proceeding on the part of the Governor by admitting Mr. Hunt even temporarily to a seat in this House.

I agree with my colleague mainly in the views which he takes in relation to the organic law of Colorado, and insist that on the face of the paper as required by that organic law the Governor should show the man declared elected has received the highest number of votes, and that he should certify to that fact as the ground upon which he is authorized to give the certificate. The language of the organic law is that "a certificate thereof shall be given by the Governor accordingly." The man who receives the highest number of votes it is provided shall be declared elected, and a certificate thereof shall be given accordingly. The certificate is to be given in accordance with the fact.

Now, it was insisted in argument before the committee on behalf of Mr. Chilcott that the certificate was defective in not showing that fact. He alleged that it was in violation of the law and not in accordance with the return of the board of canvassers. Governor Cumming himself appeared before the committee in behalf of Mr. Hunt, and endeavored to rebut that allegation. The question being propounded whether the certificate was issued before there had been a canvass, he replied that no canvass of the votes was declared or made. He then went on of his own suggestion to state the fact that two of the board were for Mr. Chilcott and one for Mr. Hunt, and that he coincided with the one for Mr. Hunt. The question was then put to him, "If that was so what right had you to issue the certificate to Mr. Hunt?"

He then finding himself embarrassed by his statement, said that he was not there as a witness. The recklessness with which he trampled upon all law in giving the certificate to a man who had not a majority of the votes was only equaled by the unblushing coolness with which he appeared before the committee and attempted to justify his palpable violation of the law.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] says this is in violation of all precedent. I will call his attention to one. I will refer him to the report of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the committee in the Thirty-Seventh Congress in the case of Daily vs. Morton. I quote from the Reports of Contested-Election Cases, page 403:

"Mr. Morton accordingly received the certificate of election, and Mr. Daily took the position of contestant. Subsequently the Governor of the Territory gave Mr. Daily a certificate of election on the ground of alleged fraud in the vote counted for Morton: revoking in said certificate as far as he was able the certificate before given to Mr. Morton. Between these two certificates as prima facie evidence of an election, entitling the holder to be sworn in in the first instance and occupy the seat pending the contest, the House decided at the last session in favor of that held by Mr. Daily, and he has accordingly occupied the seat, and Mr. Morton has been the contestant during the pendency of the contest."

Now, that goes further than I would go. It not only set aside the first certificate, but gave the prima facie case to the man with the second certificate. In this case Mr. Chilcott has the only certificate in accordance with the decision of the board of canvassers, and the first certificate does not show that it was given to the man who received the highest number of votes. The Governor admits that he gave it in violation of law. It was perhaps necessary at that time, in order to send a telegraphic dispatch to give encouragement to the celebrated Philadelphia convention. I do not know of any other reason.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Allow me to ask a question. I find in the report of the committee they have overruled the certificate of the Governor as null and void. They proceed to say thereupon that there was no legal certificate because the power was exhausted by the act of Governor Cumming, and they infer therefrom that Mr. Chilcott has no prima facie case. They assume there has been no evidence which would entitle a party to a seat here short of the certificate of the Governor. Is that so? In the absence of superior cannot inferior evidence be admitted in accordance with the well-settled principle of common law, which says the best evidence in the nature of the case should be produced. The certificate of the Governor being null and void, what is the duty of the committee but to find in accordance with the rule to which I have referred, the next best prima facie evidence. The meaning of the term, as I understand it, is that evidence which, in the absence of any contradiction, would be conclusive of the case. Then, I take it that the evidence of the return of the election which the committee had before them is Mr. Chilcott's case. I ask my colleague whether, in the absence of any other evidence, the logical result is not that Mr. Chilcott has such a case as will entitle him to a seat in the absence of any evidence to contradict it?

Mr. SCOFIELD. That is a very long question. [Laughter.] I suppose the gentleman wanted to ask a question and did not expect or desire an answer, because the question is of itself an argument. I will give it, however, a kind of answer. My colleague must remember that a committee is not exactly like a judge on the bench. It is in part like a jury to determine the facts. We pass upon the law and upon the facts at the same time. They are both often complicated. It is difficult sometimes to get a majority of nine lawyers to agree upon what the law is, and when we come to the jury part, my colleague knows it is an old maxim that there is nothing so uncertain as the verdict of a jury upon a state of facts.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Except the decision of a judge.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I was not aware that that is any more uncertain. When a majority of the committee came to the conclusion that under the state of facts presented to us we would not say that the certificate of Governor Cumming entitled Mr. Hunt to a seat as Delegate, we then considered the certificate given to the other claimant, Mr. Chilcott, and came to the conclusion—at least a majority of us—that that certificate also was not good. But the House should remember that of the six gentlemen who voted against the validity of the certificate given to Mr. Hunt only three of those same gentlemen voted against the validity of the certificate given to Chilcott. It was a kind of cross-fire. There were six against one certificate and six against the other, and three of those who were against the first certificate were in favor of the second, and vice versa.

Now, we undoubtedly have fallen upon secondary evidence and reported that the certificate of the board of canvassers reciting the fact was not sufficient upon which to base a report in favor of Mr. Chilcott. But the majority of the committee were of opinion when the House referred the papers to us to say which one was entitled to a seat prima facie that it contemplated our going no further. In the case of Koontz vs. Coffroth at the last Congress there was no certificate of election. That was a Pennsylvania case, and the Governor who heard it came to the same conclusion that the committee have come to in this case, namely, that neither of the claimants was entitled to a certificate from him. Therefore when the House referred this case to us, it referred it in order to get a report upon the secondary evidence, and accordingly upon that secondary evidence the committee reported. I stand by the report of the committee that neither one of the claimants upon the papers is entitled to a seat. But if the House can fall back upon the secondary evidence it of course is nothing to me. I stand by the report and shall so vote.

I wish, however, to make an allusion to a remark made by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.] I thought he stated with some roughness—we call it that way in the woods where I live—that the statement of the majority of the committee was not true.

Mr. POLAND. If the gentleman will allow me, I stated that the impression that was conveyed by the language of the committee was not true. I certainly did not intend to charge the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any member of the committee with conveying intentionally a false impression; but I say, the language of the report of the majority of the committee in saying that Mr. Hunt was not content to stand upon the credentials that he presented, but introduced Governor Cumming to support the case, does convey the impression that he was introduced to state some facts which were not stated in his credentials, when the fact is, as the gentleman himself will admit, that he appeared there professionally, to act merely as an attorney to argue the question of the legal validity of the credentials that he had given. Although in one sense the language is true, it conveys a meaning which the facts do not justify.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I understood the gentleman before very much as I do now. He used the words "not true," which was a pretty strong term, not to say offensive. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] might have satisfied the gentleman, if he had referred to it, that he entirely misapprehended the statement of Governor Cumming. After the argument had been heard the committee had occasion to discuss this question among themselves, and it is proper for me to state, because the chairman of the committee desired it, that he placed his judgment and his vote upon the confession of Governor Cumming that the certificate was made against the count of the canvassers in his presence. I think the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] was not present; but the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] who was not present at the time the argument was made by Mr. Cumming, obtained his version of the fact from the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] What I wished to say was, that if the statement of Governor Cumming had been vague and uncertain, the chairman of the Committee of Elections would not have based his judgment upon it, or given it as the reason why he had determined to lay aside the certificate which the Governor had issued.

I now relinquish the floor, asking the Chair to state to the House the order in which the votes will be taken upon the several propositions pending before the House.

The SPEAKER. The majority of the Committee of Elections have reported a resolution giving the seat to neither of the claimants at present. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] on behalf of a minority of the committee, moves as a substitute for the resolution of the majority of the committee, that Mr. Hunt is prima facie entitled to the seat. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COOK] moves to amend the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] so as to admit Mr. Chilcott to the seat for the present. Pending which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] moves to amend the original proposition by adding thereto what will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that pending the action of the committee and the House thereon, George M. Chilcott be sworn in as the sitting Delegate from the Territory of Colorado.

The SPEAKER. The question will be first taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] it being to perfect the original proposition.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 76, noes 52.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. KERR called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 36, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—37.

So the amendment of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of Mr. COOK to the substitute proposed by Mr. KERR.

Mr. COOK. As the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] was agreed to, son] will accomplish substantially what I desired to effect, I will withdraw my amendment.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of Mr. KERR to the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections, namely, to strike out all after the word "Resolved" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That A. C. Hunt, Esq., is prima facie entitled to the seat in this House as Delegate from the Territory of Colorado, pending the contest of his right to the same by George M. Chilcott, Esq.

The question was taken, and the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the original resolution, as amended, which was as follows:

Resolved, That the papers and evidence relating to the right of A. C. Hunt and George M. Chilcott to a seat in the Fortieth Congress as a Delegate from the Territory of Colorado be referred to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to report which, if either of said claimants is entitled thereto; and that the committee have power to require the service of such notices and grant such time for taking further evidence as they may deem proper; and that pending the action of the committee and the House thereon, George M. Chilcott be sworn in as the sitting Delegate from the Territory of Colorado.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

QUALIFICATION OF A DELEGATE.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now ask that Mr. GEORGE M. CHILCOTT be sworn in as the sitting Delegate from the Territory of Colorado, in pursuance of the resolution just adopted by the House.

Mr. CHILCOTT then appeared and took the oath prescribed by law.

REGISTRATION OF VESSELS.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I now ask leave to introduce for consideration at this time a joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe rules and regulations for the registration of certain vessels built for use on the western and northwestern lakes, upon the payment of internal revenue tax on the materials used in the construction of similar vessels of American build.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ELDRIDGE asked and obtained leave of absence for one week for Mr. MORGAN, of Ohio, on account of sickness in his family.

W. W. POTTER and W. R. INGRAHAM.

Mr. VAN AERMAN asked and obtained leave to have withdrawn from the files of the House the petitions and papers in the cases of W. W. Potter and William R. Ingraham.

MORITZ JUDKIEWICZ.

Mr. BUCKLAND, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to change the name of Moritz Judkiewicz to Morris Judd; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUCKLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 60) to authorize the entry and occupation of a portion of Long Island, in Boston harbor, for military purposes;

An act (S. No. 80) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the Government warehouses on Atlantic dock, Brooklyn, New York;

An act (S. No. 89) for the relief of Orlef E.

Deutzer, late consul of the United States to the kingdom of Norway; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 39) concerning the uniform of persons in the diplomatic service of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 7) providing for the expenses of carrying into effect the act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States."

ARTIFICIAL LIMBS FOR SOLDIERS.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of soldiers who are entitled to artificial limbs; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read at length, provides that out of any appropriations made or that hereafter may be made for supplying with artificial limbs soldiers who have served in the war against the rebellion, the Secretary of War shall be authorized to pay to such soldiers at their option, in lieu of the order for such limbs, an amount of money equivalent to the contract price of the limbs.

Mr. CHANLER. I suggest to my colleague that he should include in this bill a provision authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to cover the expenditures authorized to be made under the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] may not have noticed that, according to the provision in the first part of the resolution, this money is to come out of any appropriations made for this purpose.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I desire only to state that this resolution is word for word the same as one which was passed by the House toward the close of the last session, but which failed to receive the action of the Senate.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the joint resolution, it was passed unanimously.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 16) for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, (at two o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion. I regard this as a test question upon the bill which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] proposes we shall consider.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled House joint resolution No. 7, providing for the expenses of carrying into full effect an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States;" when the Speaker signed the same.

DESTITUTE IN THE SOUTH AND SOUTHWEST.

The question then recurred on Mr. BINGHAM's motion that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BEAMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 64, nays 52, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Baker, Barnes, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Chanler, Churchill, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ferry, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Hamilton, Hayes, Holman, Hooper, Chester D. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughridge, Lynch, Marshall, McClurg, McCullough, Moorhead, Morgan, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Selye, Spalding, Stone, Taber, Ward, William B. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—48.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLAINE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 16, for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] to withdraw his amendment to the amendment to the original joint resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.] I make the appeal in order that I may perfect the resolution by moving to amend the amendment moved by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] by striking out the appropriation of $1,000,000 and inserting after the word "prescribed" the following:

And to that end the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to apply the appropriations heretofore made and unexpended for the use of the Freedman's Bureau, the same to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of said bureau, and provided."

So that there will be no additional appropriation in the coming year.

Mr. MILLER. I will withdraw my amendment if I can renew it again.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is not now in order.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Mr. Chairman, hoarseness of voice and a very sore throat admonish me that I ought not to undertake to address the House on the present occasion. I desire to make but a few remarks in explanation, as well as in justification, of the vote which I propose to give upon the joint resolution now before the House. The resolution itself involves a principle of startling importance, and should not be passed upon without due and serious consideration.

Two controlling doubts have rested upon my mind in regard to the proposition contained in this resolution: first, as to the constitutional power of Congress to appropriate money as a simple, naked, and unqualified charity; and second, as to the agency through which it is proposed that this charity shall be administered. Sir, I look in vain among the provisions of the Constitution, either express or implied, for any expression or indication giving clear and undoubted authority to Congress to lay its hands upon a single dollar of the public treasure except for the ordinary and legitimate purposes of Government. It is a fact not to be overlooked or disregarded that none of the recognized commentators upon our Constitution—Story, Rawle, or Sedgwick—have alluded in the remotest degree to this wholesale and indiscriminate power of Congress, as now sought to be exercised, to appropriate the money of the people in the total absence of any mutual valuable consideration moving from its beneficiaries. I have neither had the time nor the opportunity, since the inauguration of this debate, to look into the works of these authors; but I challenge the friends of this resolution, whether on the Democratic or the Republican side of the House, to produce a single sentence from these leading expounders of the great organic instrument of the Government which will sustain the power now attempted to be exercised in the uncontrolled disposition of the public treasure. It is, therefore, at least a mooted question, about which there may exist an honest difference of opinion, and to the correct solution of which each member must bring such lights and such convictions as he may have upon the subject. Sir, so far as my action is concerned, I could not give my support to this resolution even upon the theory of a doubtful assumption of constitutional power. It struck me as somewhat unusual, if not slightly amusing, Mr. Chairman, to see some of our friends on this side of the House quoting the Thirty-Ninth Congress as an authority which was not to be questioned upon a point of constitutional power. In looking over the list of laws passed by the last Congress, the very titles of a large number of them do not impress the mind very strongly with the belief that the Constitution was much in the way of any measure or project desired by the majority in that Congress. I admit that a legislative act, even when brought to the test of judicial construction, is sometimes treated as a species of quasi adjudication upon doubtful questions of constitutional power and construction. But this principle only applies where the question is doubtful and where there has been a long and unconflicting line of clear and explicit legislative precedent in favor of such construction. There is no recognized rule of constructive interpretation which can give this power to the Legislature upon any language used in the Constitution. Gentlemen upon this floor have claimed that we have numerous legislative precedents for such appropriations. This may be so; but I have no recollection of a single instance where a money appropriation has been made for any such purpose.

The allusions made to the action of Congress upon the subject of the Greek revolution and the Irish famine, unless I am greatly mistaken in my recollection, do not sustain the proposition contained in this resolution. The only proceedings of Congress of any positive character in relation to the struggle of the Greeks to throw off the Mussulman yoke in 1825, was embodied in simple resolutions of sympathy and encouragement. No money was voted; no material aid was tendered. During the session of 1826, Mr. Livingston offered the following resolution in the House:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to prepare and bring in a bill making an appropriation of $50,000, to be expended under the direction of the President, in the purchase and transportation of provisions for the suffering inhabitants of Greece."

The resolution was laid on the table, and was never afterward taken up. So, too, in relation to the famine in Ireland a few years ago. My memory is greatly at fault if Congress appropriated a single dollar in money or provisions for the relief of the Irish people. The tender of a public vessel for the transportation of private donations did not necessarily involve the money power of Congress. Nor would a single or a few instances of like appropriation present such a line of kindred and consecutive precedent as would establish even a legislative construction of the powers of the Constitution. If this power, thus claimed, were not, in effect, a new question; if it was not practically the first time in the history of American legislation in which Congress seriously proposed to exercise this doubtful power over the money of the people to a large amount; then, even as a member of that class of legislators which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] so sneeringly denominates as "strict constructionists," I should with great pleasure record my vote in favor of the power thus assumed for so noble and praiseworthy an object. But in times like these, so eminently and fearfully revolutionary in their character—when constitutions and the great organic principles of the Government are kicked about like foot-balls in these Halls of legislation—I glory in the character of a rigid and unbending constitutionalist.

Sir, if this was a mere matter of expediency or humanity, and not a question of solemn constitutional power, reaching up to the obligations of the oath we have taken to support and maintain that Constitution, there is no gentleman on this floor who would more cheerfully vote for this bill than I would. If I were satisfied of our constitutional power over this subject, no fear of the precedent we would thus establish for future legislation, no apprehension of popular disfavor, no impression that this donation might be ungratefully received on the part of the objects of our bounty, would repel me from voting for even five times the amount proposed in this bill. It has every sympathy of my heart. I was deeply impressed with the touching and eloquent appeal of my colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM.] Every impulse of my heart throbbed responsive to the noble and gushing sentiments of that impassioned invocation; but legislation under a written Constitution like ours means something more than mere passion and sentiment. The passions, and even the duty, of the heart is one thing; the stern and logical necessity of reason, the imperative obligations of a sworn and conscientious public duty, is quite another and a different consideration. The dictates of this paramount obligation I cannot, dare not, disregard. Entertaining these doubts upon the question of constitutional power, I am compelled, reluctantly compelled, to record my vote against the passage of this bill.

One word, Mr. Chairman, as to the proposed channel through which this charity is to be administered. That would be a stumbling-block in my way, even in the absence of constitutional doubts. The Freedmen's Bureau is an institution created for a specific and clearly-defined purpose. The resolution now under consideration provides for no scheme of distribution. There is no clear and well-defined declaration of the trust. The precise object of the charity is not made manifest by any clear description of its beneficiaries. It simply adopts the bureau as its agent, without any instructions whatever. The whole management and disposition of this fund, then, is subject to the mere discretion, to say nothing of the prejudice and partisan feeling, of these bureau superintendents. My confidence in this most anomalous department of the Government will have to be much more decided and ardent than it now is to make me willing to intrust it with the management of a fund of this magnitude, while the object of the fund remains so vague and indefinite. And more than all this: even if this appropriation involved no higher question than that of legislative expediency, we have from this people no petitions upon our tables asking for this charity: no satisfactory evidence before us that they will accept this donation at our hands. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, in the light of occurring events around us, it would not be at all surprising if they should wholly reject it. It is folly to shut our eyes to the relations of the parties. Congress, by passing this resolution, will voluntarily put itself in the position, with reference to the southern people and its past and current legislation, of holding a whip of scorpions in one hand and a cruse of oil of the Good Samaritan in the other. The picture would be curious, but it would be strictly truthful and historic. Now, I am in favor of no such ridiculous and absurd position as that. Is this House ready to do so? You have already done so by legislation now actually pending on the Speaker's table. Who among us can read the most extraordinary bill introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] on yesterday, or that powerful and most concentrated gall of bitterness, his speech, upon its introduction—a bill and a speech which seeks to wrest from its owners, by an exertion of mere legislative power and as a punishment of crime without trial or conviction, more than five hundred millions of property—without feeling in the depths of his heart that such legislation, coupled with any rational idea of Christian charity, is but the merest mockery of justice, and the very acme of insult and degradation.

Sir, the action of an American Congress in regard to the southern people should long ago have been based upon one of two distinct and unequivocal propositions. There should have been no doubt of the political status of that people from the moment they laid down their arms and submitted themselves to the Federal authority; they should, every man, woman, and child of them who had been identified with the rebellion, either have been driven into the Gulf of Mexico, or have been taken back trustingly and kindly into all their former relations with the Union. This intermediate and unrelenting torture, in the nature of an extra-judicial punishment, is unchristian and inhuman, and is fast making the American name a by-word and a reproach among even the monarchical nations of the earth.

I know not how the southern people will feel on this question; but this much I do know: that if I were in their place, with every right belonging to them as men and citizens trampled under foot, with organized and undismembered States made subject to all the burdens, and stripped of all the privileges of the common government, with their civil courts abolished, and a military despotism placed over them as the sole and irresponsible arbiter of their lives and property; I say, sir, that under all these circumstances of tyranny and oppression, if I were one of them, with all the instincts of an American freeman still in my possession, I would die by the slow and terrible process of starvation rather than touch one dollar of this congressional charity.

Mr. Chairman, what the people of the South now most stand in need of is, not bread, but justice; not charity, but constitutional liberty; not a mockery of woe, but a manly appreciation as peers; not a doubtful bounty, but a real and full fellowship in the great and glorious privileges of a Federal Union, which shall recognize, under the Constitution, the perfect equality of States, reestablishing civil law where military despotism now dominates, and insure to them the blessings of representative government instead of an abject and degrading vassalage. Give to this downtrodden people these great heritages of American freemen and we shall hear no more of want and destitution.

They will then be able to take care of themselves, and will neither need nor solicit alms.

Sir, in my humble opinion, the Congress of the United States will best discharge its whole duty to the Constitution, to humanity, to a Christian civilization, and to a wise and noble statesmanship, by according to the southern people, standing as organized and legitimate States within the Union, all their political rights, and all their just powers of local self-government, as equal members of the confederacy. To do this would, indeed, be a heavenly charity; not as a humiliating gift, not as an unsolicited donation, not as an indifferent alms by the wayside; but in the spirit of that higher and broader charity which pertains to masses of men rather than to individuals, and which recognizes the principles of justice and ignores all sense of wrong and oppression. A policy like this would do more to heal the great wounds of the country, more to inaugurate peace and harmony and mutual respect among the distracted sections, than if you were to pour out the entire treasure of the nation as an alms to a proud and high-spirited people.

I am at a loss, Mr. Chairman, to understand the motive and the spring of action which impels the other side of the House, although they are somewhat divided in their position as to the bill now before us, to propose to vote $1,000,000 to a people whom they have oppressed by a studied system of hostile legislation unparalleled in modern times. Is it intended as some reparation for the wrongs thus inflicted upon them? Is it, at last, compensation rather than charity? Is reaction in the Republican mind, like reaction in all other over-excitements, whether moral or physical, about to take place, and thus restore the popular feeling to that normal condition of quiet and repose so well calculated to bring about a good understanding between parties now hostile and belligerent? If there is any feeling of this sort connected with this measure on the part of those who advocate this bill as members of the party on the other side of the House, why not frankly apply the real remedy at once, with straightforward directness and earnestness? Several gentlemen on the Republican side put the merits of this bill upon the ground that it would tend to bring about reconstruction and reconciliation. If that is a thing desired by our friends on the other side of the Hall, or by a portion of them, there is a much more effectual mode of accomplishing the object. Repeal your Freedmen's Bureau bills, your civil rights bills, your negro suffrage bills, and your military reconstruction bills, and you will do more to reunite a divided people, more to put the country on the high-road to prosperity and greatness, more to reinvigorate all the channels of trade, of commerce, and of the industrial arts, than you can by all the money you can create by paper-mills and steam printing-presses, when applied in the way of a loose and indefinite charity to a people who are too proud to acknowledge or even accept the favor as an alms, and who are too much broken down by political oppression to be permanently benefited by its reception.

For these reasons, sir, and for many more which might be enumerated, I shall earnestly and conscientiously record my vote against the passage of the bill.

Mr. WOOD. The honorable gentleman from Ohio yields to me the residue of his time. It is not my intention, sir, to prolong this debate to any length. I wish merely to present six reasons which influence my mind and which determine me to vote against the passage of the pending joint resolution. I shall not elaborate these points or detain the committee from proceeding to an immediate vote.

Mr. Chairman, I will not vote for the pending joint resolution for the following reasons:

First, Because Congress has no power under the Constitution to make appropriations of public money for charitable purposes;

Second, Because neither the southern States nor people have applied to Congress or the Government for such aid;

Third, Because the arguments which have been advanced in this House in favor of the appropriation by those who have participated in passing measures destructive of the political rights of the southern States and oppressive of the southern people place the gift proposed on grounds insulting and derogatory;

Fourth, Because the money will be disbursed through the agency of the Freedmen's Bureau, whose agents in many cases are not only unsafe custodians of public money, but disqualified by prejudice against the white people of the South to make an impartial distribution of funds for charitable purposes;

Fifth, Because the sudden philanthropy of those who propose this measure at this time, immediately preceding the southern elections, is calculated to excite suspicion that political and not benevolent motives lie at the bottom of the proposition;

Sixth, And because the Freedmen's Bureau has already over two million one hundred thousand dollars to its credit unexpended, which can be used by its chief to relieve any cases of actual want that may exist among the southern people.

Mr. Chairman, for these reasons, without any attempt to go into any discussion explanatory of them, I shall vote against the pending measure. I state very broadly and explicitly that either one of them would prevent this measure from receiving my vote.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire that the committee shall come to a vote upon this question, and I now offer an additional proviso to come in after that offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment, as offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] will first be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That there shall be expended from the appropriation herein made, under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture, the sum of $50,000 for the purchase of seeds, to be distributed among the destitute people of the South by the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to add the following proviso:

And provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used for the purposes aforesaid until the unexpended appropriations heretofore made by existing law for the use of the Freedmen's Bureau shall have been first applied to the purposes herein specified, under the direction of the Commissioner of said bureau.

Mr. BINGHAM. The committee will see, if this proviso is incorporated in the resolution, not one cent can be drawn from the Treasury for the purpose specified in the original Senate resolution until all the money unappropriated by existing laws for the use of the Freedmen's Bureau shall have been first applied to the purpose specified in the original resolution, to wit, to supply the wants of the destitute and famishing in the southern and southwestern States.

Mr. SCHENCK. If I understood my colleague, he would take it away from the loyal and give it to the disloyal.

Mr. BINGHAM. I regret very much that my colleague labors under so strange a hallucination. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] yesterday reminded the House truly that in the appropriation made in the several cases passed in the Thirty-Ninth Congress there was no limitation to the loyal; and he stated also very truly that in the expenditure of that money the disloyal who happened to be refugees within the meaning of those statutes were provided for by the Freedmen's Bureau.

But the occasion for this enlargement, Mr. Chairman, is this: there are large numbers of poor whites, as they are known in the several States of the South, who are not refugees; and I undertake to say a majority of those who are now suffering never were disloyal to your flag, who cannot be relieved at all by your existing laws, even though the existing appropriation were sufficient for that purpose, for the reason that those laws restrict the Freedmen's Bureau to the use of funds for the relief first of freedmen, that is to say, men who have been slaves, and second of refugees, that is to say, men who are in the sense of that word refugees escaping.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will answer my colleague, if he will allow me to interrupt him.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask to be allowed to make an explanation, as the gentleman referred to me.

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. When we established the Freedmen's Bureau we appropriated several million dollars, since which time we have appropriated about twelve million dollars for the same purpose, for the freedmen and refugees. It did not mean loyal or disloyal; it meant refugees who were suffering, whether they were loyal or disloyal; and upon the reports, so far as I have observed them lately, in many parts of the country about three fourths of the persons fed were white refugees. That far the statement of the gentleman is true. Now, I do not see any reason why they should not go on the same way, unless you want to bring in a class of sturdy beggars to be fed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand my colleague to have yielded to me for a moment. I wish to be understood about this matter in the remark I made about giving preference to the disloyal. If my colleague will look at General Howard's report he will find that what we call the Bureau of Freedmen is in fact by law a Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands. He will find, too, in the provisions made for the relief to be given under the bureau as thus organized by law some ten or twelve million dollars have already been given. It is the practice to give, in the first place, as a matter of course, to the freedmen, for they are named, not by preference to others, but there is a distinction made by the general epithet, and I suppose I may appeal to my colleague to know whether they belong to the loyal class rather than the disloyal. In the next place to the refugees, and I admit without stating whether they are loyal or disloyal. Practically, every starving man, woman, or child who has come to the bureau asking for rations has been treated as a refugee, and has received these rations, and the returns from Richmond and other points, where three whites to one negro were fed by rations issued under the direction of the Freedmen's Bureau, will show that no inquiry was made beyond the fact whether they were needy or not.

General Howard, near the close of his report, says that for all these purposes the $5,000,000 last appropriated is ample. What, then, further is asked? That somebody who has not been thus fed, that somebody who is not a freedman or a refugee, who is not a destitute man, woman, or child, who has come petitioning for rations, shall be taken care of; and, if I understand it, it can only be the sturdy disloyalist, too lazy to work, but still wanting to be supported at the expense of the Government of the United States.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am very much obliged to my colleague. [Mr. SCHENCK] for making the statement he has made, and I intend, too, that he shall be understood. He has stated here now in the hearing of the committee that no starving man or woman or child, whether loyal or disloyal, has been denied relief by the Freedmen's Bureau. If that be the case, then, if the gentleman favors that conduct of the bureau, he cannot object to the amendment which I have offered, which requires the bureau in the future not to inquire whether the starving poor have been loyal or disloyal. And that being the case, I would like to know what becomes of the objection of my colleague, that we propose to transfer this fund from the loyal to the disloyal? And in this connection I beg leave to say further that in the report to which my colleague has referred General Howard has notified the Congress of the United States that not merely $1,000,000, but $1,500,000 additional will be needed for this purpose; and yet I feel at liberty to say this much, that General Howard—

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, yes.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say, in connection with what the gentleman has said about the report of General Howard, that I am told by an honorable member of this House that General Howard stated to him this morning in a committee-room of this House that he had ample appropriations now unexpended to supply the wants of all classes of persons in the whole South, without one dollar more, until December next.

Mr. BINGHAM. And I will say one thing further—if the gentleman pleases: that General Howard told me this day in this Hall—if I may be pardoned for stating what he said—

Mr. LOGAN. I can give the gentleman the name of my informant.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not doubt the accuracy of the statement made by the gentleman; but I want to state as one of the reasons why I offered the amendment which was ruled out of order by the chairman, to strike out this appropriation of $1,000,000, that General Howard himself informed me that under the existing law he could not appropriate the money he now had to relieve all the suffering indiscriminately, for the reason that by the very terms of your law the relief is limited to freedmen and refugees. Now, having had somewhat to do in framing the last bill in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, I undertake to say, with all respect to my colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK,] that the word "refugees" has not been construed by the Freedmen's Bureau to embrace people who are dwelling within the States of their nativity, who are refugees from no one and from no law, but who are starving in their own houses.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am certain that is a mistake.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to inquire of my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] if he knows how much money there is now in the hands of the Freedmen's Bureau unexpended which can be used for the purpose of assisting distressed people in the South?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not know precisely, but I infer from my interview with General Howard that there might possibly be $1,500,000 which could be appropriated to this purpose, if my amendment should be adopted.

Mr. ALLISON. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he says that the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau is now restricted to assisting refugees and freedmen.

Mr. BINGHAM. In supplying food.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, in supplying food.

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly he is.

Mr. ALLISON. And that he cannot use any of the funds heretofore appropriated, except in that way, unless there be additional legislation.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is what I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I desire to know from my friend from Ohio whether or not his proviso will enlarge in any sense the existing law. It does not seem to me to have that effect.

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg leave to say that it does enlarge it to just this extent—

Mr. SCHENCK. Will my colleague allow me to say—

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir, I cannot yield now; and let me say that I do not intend that this cause shall be higgled and chopped to pieces by its enemies.

I am obliged to the gentleman from Iowa for making the suggestion. The proviso I have offered does enlarge existing legislation to this extent: that whether the famishing poor in the South be black or white, whether they be freedmen, refugees, or other persons, the funds heretofore appropriated for these very purposes, but limited to freedmen and refugees can, if the proviso be adopted, be applied to the relief of whatever persons may be famishing for bread, whether or not they answer the description of refugees or freedmen.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman what is included in the term "refugees?" Have the officers of the bureau, in relieving destitution, ever made any distinction between the poor loyalist and the poor disloyalist?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have always understood that the term "refugee" has a specific and definite meaning in the law, and never did apply to any person except those who have been expelled from their own region of country, or of their own choice have sought refuge elsewhere.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. All I can say is that nine out of ten of those who have been fed by the Freedmen's Bureau have been disloyal men who had become poor.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, if that be so, the gentleman ought not to object to my proviso, unless it really be his purpose that when men are dying from hunger, an inquest shall be held to determine whether they fall within the definition of refugees or freedmen, and that unless the question be decided in the affirmative we shall let them die. That is the position which is assumed here.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to ask my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] a question. I have just been reading his proviso, and I do not wish to do any injustice to his purpose; but it seems to me that if he has a definite design in his mind he has failed to express it in language which will carry out what I think is desired by the mass of those who will vote with him. If I construe correctly the language of the proviso it simply forbids the expenditure of another dollar by the Freedmen's Bureau under existing laws until all the money now at the disposal of the bureau shall be diverted to this object and expended in carrying it out?

Mr. SCHENCK. That is precisely what it does.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] to permit the proviso to be again read; and I think that when he has carefully observed its language he will be obliged, as a lawyer, to confess that its effect will be precisely this: to divert from its regular uses every dollar already appropriated for the Freedmen's Bureau, and expend it for the purpose specified in this joint resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. And then, when that fund has been expended, the officers of the bureau can draw upon this appropriation of $1,000,000 for the same purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir; that is the effect of the proviso. It will not only apply to this single purpose the appropriation now made, but will divert to the same object the fund already appropriated; so that not one dollar will go toward the purposes of the Freedmen's Bureau as hitherto administered.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will relieve my colleague. I thought the text of the joint resolution would be used in its construction. But my colleague has overlooked that matter, and has confined himself to the language of my proviso. But in order that my colleague may be relieved, I will repeat this at the risk of putting into the statute, if this proviso be adopted, what may be called surplusage or tautology and agree that the words "to supply food" shall be inserted in the proviso as in the original text of the joint resolution, and thereupon my colleague cannot hesitate in his judgment of the matter.

Mr. GARFIELD rose.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not now. I want the committee to understand this. There is no mistake about it. Let me refer to the original text of the joint resolution. The Secretary of War is empowered and directed to issue supplies of food sufficient to prevent starvation and extreme want to any and all classes of the people in those southern and southwestern States where a failure of the crops and other causes have occasioned wide-spread destitution, and that such issues shall be made through the Freedmen's Bureau under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe. The proviso which I wish to follow it, giving the suggestion of my colleague touching this matter of food, will be as follows:

Provided further. That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used for the purpose aforesaid until all unexpended appropriations heretofore made by existing law for the purpose of the Freedmen's Bureau to supply food shall have been first applied to the purpose as herein specified, under the direction of the Commissioner of said bureau.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having made that correction, I take the opportunity to say—

Mr. BOUTWELL. I apprehend the gentleman has not met the difficulty in the original bill. The original bill provides that the Freedmen's Bureau may issue supplies of food and clothing, and may also furnish shelter to freedmen and refugees.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am aware of that.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Under that the bureau has set up asylums in various parts of the South where they take care of the sick and infirm. If I understand the proposition before the committee, as modified by the gentleman from Ohio, it destroys at once the power of the Freedmen's Bureau to issue supplies of clothing to the destitute or to keep up these asylums.

Mr. BINGHAM. I put the words of limitation so that the agent appointed is to draw until he has expended the fund designated by law for the supply of food.

Mr. BOUTWELL. This limits the issue of supplies to certain goods—to the supply of food. Now, then, you prevent, by the proviso of the gentleman from Ohio, that $1,000,000 being expended until the money now on hand in the Freedmen's Bureau shall be expended according to the provisions of this joint resolution, to wit, furnishing food, so that we prohibit the furnishing of any more clothing.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman is mistaken. By the insertion of the words "heretofore provided for furnishing food" he is only limited to that extent.

Mr. GARFIELD rose.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to make a statement. I know what the gentleman from Massachusetts refers to. In the original bill, passed at the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, there were about three million dollars appropriated distinctly for supplying food, a million and a half for the distinct purpose of supplying clothing, and another large amount of money distinctly for the purpose of transportation. There was another definite sum that was appropriated distinctly for the purpose of education. Now, these words of limitation here are to this effect: that he shall first exhaust the fund appropriated by existing law for the purpose of supplying food.

Mr. SPALDING. Does my colleague believe in the resolutions of 1798?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not know why my colleague puts such a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to put a practical question. I want to know of my colleague whether these appropriations to which he refers were not made in the lump for all the purposes?

Mr. BINGHAM. They were not; they were definite and distinct. I have stated it two or three times. My colleague makes an inquiry which furnishes the key to this whole matter. I supposed the committee understood it, but I will state again that under the existing laws there are definite appropriations, which I understand are unexpended, for the purpose of supplying destitute freedmen and refugees with bread. Now, the amendment which I offer is simply to extend the provisions of these existing laws so that the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau may apply these definite appropriations now unexpended under existing laws to supply food to all classes of persons in the southern and southwestern States who are famishing for bread, without the limitation of the words "freedmen or refugees." That is all there is of it.

Mr. PILE. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. PILE. I suggest that we are all agreed that it is desirable to reach the object aimed at by the gentleman from Ohio; but the difference of opinion seems to me to be with reference to the method of reaching it so as not to conflict with existing laws or interfere with the charities already provided for through the Freedmen's Bureau. Hence it seems to me, in order to accomplish the object, we had better vote down all the various amendments, and then substitute a resolution for the Senate resolution. That, I think, will make the matter perfectly clear.

Mr. BINGHAM. There will be no difficulty in doing that if the gentleman from Massachusetts, now in the House, would withdraw his pending substitute, so that another might be offered.

Mr. PILE. I desire to have a substitute that I have drawn read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, through "the Bureau of Freedmen, Refugees, and Abandoned Lands," to extend at his discretion the distribution of food and clothing authorized to be issued to refugees and freedmen of the rebel States, so as to include any destitute women or children or helpless aged persons.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the gentleman will not limit it in that way, but modify it so as to include all destitute persons.

Mr. PILE. I think my proposition is very broad. It says women, children, and helpless aged persons.

Mr. BINGHAM. I know it does, but does the gentleman mean to say that all persons in middle life are to be excluded? Sir, if gentlemen are disposed to trifle with this I throw down the gauntlet and defy them. I do not propose to insult starving men because they happen to be in middle life. I yielded to the gentleman, not supposing he would offer such a proposition, but that he was going to limit it simply to those who were suffering; and I now appeal to him to change the words of his substitute so that it will include all classes who are suffering.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition is not pending as an amendment. It was read for information.

Mr. PILE. I have no objection to modifying it as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I did not know he had been up all this time. I supposed he had said enough. [Laughter.]

Mr. DONNELLY. I desire to have an amendment reported for information.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will hear it.

Mr. DONNELLY. I desire to move the following proviso:

Provided, however, That the total amount so to be expended for food shall not exceed $1,000,000, unless it becomes apparent to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau that further expenditures are absolutely necessary to save men, women, and children from death by starvation.

Mr. BINGHAM. That comes in at the end of my proviso?

Mr. DONNELLY. Yes, sir. I ask the gentleman to accept it as a modification of his amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I accept it, to come in at the end of the proviso I have moved. I now move that the committee rise and report the joint resolution and pending amendments to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to move to report a bill or joint resolution from the Committee of the Whole while any amendment thereto is pending.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAINE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, according to order, had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly Senate joint resolution No. 16, for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BINGHAM. I now move that when the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole and resume the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 16, all general debate upon the joint resolution and amendments thereto shall be terminated in two minutes.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and upon a division, there were—ayes 58, noes 50.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. RANDALL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 66, nays 61, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Baker, Baldwin, Boutwell, Broomall, Butler, Cake, Chandler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Elna, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Hooper, Hulburt, Hunter, Judd, Kitchen, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Morrill, Newcomb, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Polsley, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Aaron F. So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p.m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 21, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NORTON presented resolutions of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of exempting from duty all live stock coming into that State from the Red river settlements; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of appropriations for the improvement of the State road from St. Cloud to Fort Abercrombie, in Dakota Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of a wagon-road from the western line of that State to Helena, in the Territory of Montana; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the establishment of a daily mail route from Rushford, in that State, to Decorah, Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of a branch extension of the United States military road between Fort Howard, Wisconsin, and Fort Wilkins, Michigan, from the village of Shawano to the village of Wanson; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 4) for the relief of William Shunk, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was recommended the resolution (S. R. No. 21) in reference to the collection and payment of moneys due colored soldiers, sailors, and marines, or their heirs, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 73) to exempt ladders from internal tax, reported adversely, and moved that it be postponed indefinitely; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am unanimously instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) to extend to the employés in the first division of the National Currency Bureau of the Treasury Department the provisions of the joint resolution approved 23d February, 1867, giving additional compensation to certain employés in the civil service at Washington, to report it back and recommend its indefinite postponement. It is the unanimous opinion of the committee that these explanatory resolutions ought not to be passed. Numerous applications have been made from different Departments for similar resolutions; and if one is passed another must be, and there will be no end to this sort of legislation. As the letter addressed to the committee by the Comptroller explains his decision to the effect that he holds that the female employés in the Currency Bureau can be paid their twenty per cent. compensation, and that his decision only excludes male employés there who are paid by the day and whose pay may be increased at the pleasure of the head of the division, it is regarded as inexpedient to commence this sort of legislation, and the committee have concluded not to extend the application of the resolution referred to in this report beyond the classes designated in it. I move that this joint resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM MARYLAND.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom have been referred the credentials of Hon. P. F. Thomas, chosen a Senator of the United States by the Legislature of Maryland, be authorized to send for persons and papers for the purposes of said reference.

OLDENBURG CONSUL AT NEW YORK.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest, copies of any recent correspondence on the files of the Department of State relating to the exequatur of the consul of the Grand Duchy of Oldenburg, residing at New York.

REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. FESSENDEN. By expiration of their term of office two of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution on the part of the Senate have gone out, and it is necessary to fill the vacancies. I move, therefore, that the two vacancies in the Regents on the part of the Senate be filled by appointment by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. TRUMBULL and Mr. DAVIS.

WRAPPING-PAPER.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Committee on Finance, who have had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 72) to exempt wrapping-paper made from wood or corn-stalks from internal tax, report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration. I presume there will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will merely say that under the recent act passed by Congress amending the internal revenue laws, wrapping-paper made of straw is exempt from tax. I am free to say that I should prefer that all wrapping-paper should be subject to a tax; but having exempted that made from straw, it is very apparent that that made from wood and corn-stalks, used for identically the same purpose, ought also to be exempt.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BOUNTY TO MISSOURI TROOPS.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 6) placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with others as to bounties, to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of that joint resolution. The matter has been reported upon two or three times by the Military Committee of the Senate, and this resolution has now passed the House of Representatives, having been thoroughly investigated by the Military Committee of the House, and as it relates to a most meritorious body of troops who rendered in every way most efficient service in the State of Missouri during the entire rebellion, I would earnestly ask the Senate to give unanimous consent to its present consideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If it is to take any time I shall feel constrained to object to it, because I desire to call up the joint resolution from the House suspending the operations of certain commissioners who are assessing damages for slaves. I expected to get it up yesterday, but found it impossible to do so, another matter having the attention of the Senate. If this measure is not to lead to discussion I shall not object.

Mr. DRAKE. I am not aware that it will lead to any.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Has the Senator any assurance that it is not to be opposed?

Mr. DRAKE. I have never heard a word of opposition to it from any quarter.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will not object if it does not cause delay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution? The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the troops recognized in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for completing the defenses of Washington, and for other purposes," approved February 13, 1862, also all those borne on the rolls as "slaves," shall be considered as placed on an equal footing with the volunteers as to bounties, and that all laws relating to bounties shall be applicable to them as to other volunteers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have some explanation of this measure. I do not know exactly what it means.

Mr. DRAKE. I will state that under the authority of an act of Congress there was organized in the State of Missouri for the special purpose of repelling the movements of rebel troops from the southward there, and of keeping the rebel element in Missouri in subjection, a body of ten thousand troops. Those troops have never yet been placed upon the same footing with regard to bounties with the other troops of the United States, and this is simply a resolution to put them in that position, nothing more. There is nothing beyond that in the resolution. It has been reported upon two or three times by the Military Committee of this body, as I stated before; and now it has been reported upon favorably by the Military Committee of the House, and has passed the House and has come to us for concurrence. I earnestly hope that the matter will commend itself to the judgment of the entire Senate as being only right and proper that these men, who were in all respects exactly the same as the other volunteers of the United States, except that they were organized for the specific purpose of resisting the rebellion on the soil of Missouri, and performed their duties there, should be put on the same footing with all the other troops. I know of no explanation that can be given beyond this, except to say that in the whole Army of the United States during the rebellion I hardly think there was a body of men who more faithfully performed their duty and who rendered more acceptable service to the country than this body of troops did. I hope very much that the explanation will be satisfactory to the honorable Senator from Maine.

Mr. HOWARD. I have been informed, and I suppose correctly, that these troops served not only within the limits of Wisconsin, but that they served generally beyond the limits of that State, like other volunteers, wherever they were ordered.

Mr. DRAKE. Certainly they served where ever they were ordered; but the specific object of the first formation of that body of troops by President Lincoln was to resist the influences that were at work in that State to take it out of the Union and to resist aggressions from the southward. They were mustered in for three years, and during the war served not only in the State, but out of the State wherever they were required to serve; but the primary object was that which I have stated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to know why they do not come under the act making appropriations for bounties.

Mr. DRAKE. My colleague, who is more familiar with that matter, can probably explain it to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HENDERSON. In the early part of the war the United States troops in Missouri were called out of the State in order to go into Tennessee and Kentucky, leaving us there almost entirely defenseless. An incursion was made into the State. A proposition was made by the then acting Governor of the State, Governor Gamble, that he would raise ten regiments over our quota, ten regiments more than we were bound to raise under the call of the War Department, provided they should not when raised be sent out of the State. Mr. Lincoln accepted the proposition of Governor Gamble, and the ten regiments were raised. That was in the early spring of 1862. In March, 1862, the Senator from Massachusetts reported a bill to prevent the raising of more than ten regiments under the order which was made by the War Department, but providing that those ten regiments might be mustered into the United States service, and put upon an equal footing with other troops, but no more. After they had served two years, under an opinion given by Mr. Whiting, who was then acting as Solicitor of the War Department, they were refused bounty. They were paid by the United States; they were subsisted by the United States; and they were, as we supposed, upon an equal footing in all respects with other volunteers; but, strange to say, after two years' service this refusal came to pay them bounties. They, however, went on and served out their time until the close of the war. Some of them served three years and four or five months, and all of them served over three years.

Mr. HOWE. Do I understand the Senator to say that they were mustered into the service of the United States?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir, that is my understanding. It is proper for me to say, however, that Mr. Whiting took the contrary ground. He said they were local troops. Such was not my understanding. I have not the act before me; but I will turn the Senator's attention in a few moments to the act passed in March, 1862, to which I have alluded.

Much to my surprise, this decision was made that these troops were not entitled to bounty. They were entitled to pensions; they were entitled to pay; they were entitled to subsistence; and they were regarded in Missouri in every respect as United States troops; but this opinion of Mr. Whiting treated them as State troops. Early in January of 1866 I submitted a resolution asking the War Department why bounty had not been paid to these troops, and in answer to that resolution Mr. Stanton sent to the Senate, under date of May 19, 1866, a report, from which I will read:

"The question as to whether these bounties were payable under existing laws having arisen in the Pay Bureau, it was referred to the Solicitor of the War Department for investigation and opinion. That opinion, which was adverse to the claim under existing laws, has been excepted to by able counsel on the ground that certain facts and legal enactments were overlooked which materially affect the question."

Mr. Whiting, in giving his opinion, was utterly unaware, it seems, of the act of March, 1862, which in effect mustered these troops into the service of the United States. Four regiments in Maryland, accepted under the very same terms, were paid their bounty; and I never knew that any distinction was made until we received this opinion. But, says the Secretary:

"But the Secretary has not felt at liberty to make so large an expenditure of money against the opinion of the law officer of the Department, when all doubts might be removed by legislative action. He has, therefore, declined to pay these bounties until plainly directed by Congress."

"Reports of the meritorious service of these troops elsewhere than in the State of Missouri during the war, by military commanders cognizant of the facts, are herewith submitted. These reports are believed to be correct in fact. Whether in view of the service the claim for bounties should be paid appears to be a question of legislative discretion, that can be appropriately determined only by Congress. From the military reports the claim seems to be meritorious."

"Very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,
EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then they served out of the State of Missouri?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly; and the Secretary of War sent here reports of the commanders under whom these troops had served. I propose to read from these military commanders in regard to these troops. I have before me the opinion of Mr. Whiting, which Senators will see in the document to which I have alluded, and also the opinion of the Paymaster General. - Mr. Whiting clearly overlooks the act of March, 1862; but I will first read the report of General E. B. Brown:

St. Louis, January 29, 1866.

Sir: In reply to your request asking me to inform you if the Missouri State militia served with me in any other State than Missouri, and if that service, if rendered, was done willingly, I have the honor to state that from June 1, 1862, to January 18, 1863, I was on duty in the field in southwest Missouri and Arkansas, and during most of that time had the command of the southwestern district, which was the advance line of the Union forces, and that the larger proportion of the troops with me were Missouri State militia. That repeated raids and expeditions were made into Arkansas during that time by these troops, and there was no hesitation on their part to perform their duty cheerfully. The official reports will show that some of these expeditions resulted in important captures of the property and troops of the enemy, and that all were successful affairs. The Missouri State militia served with me for three years, side by side with volunteers under another name, and I never recognized any difference in the kind or value of service they performed.

I am, very truly, your obedient servant,

E. B. BROWN,

Late Brigadier General of Volunteers.

Colonel SAMUEL P. SIMPSON, Adjutant General of Missouri, Jefferson City.

General James Totten says—I will not read all of his communication:

"As you are aware, I was one of the very first among those whose position and surroundings brought them in contact with the rebellious spirits of 1861 in Missouri; and the greater portion of my military life since the initiation of the rebellion has been within the borders of Missouri and her sister State, Arkansas, and always, more or less, in connection with the men of those States." * * * "They marched with myself and other officers within and without the State of Missouri—crossed and recrossed the borders between Arkansas and their own State, on various occasions, by night and day, in winter and summer, and at all times with zeal and alacrity—a cheerful willingness, which, on certain of these occasions, proved anything else than pleasure trips to those concerned."

General Pleasanton says:

"During the year 1864, while I was serving in the Department of Missouri, upon various occasions, I had occasion to observe the gallant conduct and esprit du corps which characterized this force. Especially during the campaign against Price in the fall of that year it was more conspicuous.

"They have never, to my knowledge, refused to leave the line of the State, which the terms of their enlistment as a local force might be construed to justify, but they were always ready to follow, seek, and fight the enemy either within or without the borders of their State.

"I am impressed that in all respects they possessed the characteristics of other United States volunteers."

Remember, these communications were sent here by the Secretary of War in answer to my resolution. General McNeil says:

"I have always found the different regiments of Missouri State militia ready and willing to march whenever or wherever ordered, and to meet the enemies of the Union where they could find them. No other troops have performed so much service in Missouri, and no troops have fought better when in action. They have always been orderly, subordinate, and dutiful, as well as vigilant, patriotic men, patient of endurance."

It is evident that Mr. Stanton was clearly of opinion that these troops were entitled to bounty; I think that is manifest from his letter; but he declines to pay it, because of the opinion of the Solicitor, given, as I have stated, in utter ignorance of the legislation of Congress. I will now read what General Curtis says of these troops:

"These troops I always considered United States volunteers, subject to duty in and out of the State, and I considered them perfectly reliable everywhere. I often sent them beyond the Missouri border to fight, and many of them poured out their blood on distant battle-fields for our cause and country; and I have also shared with them the conflicts which mingled in common graves their bodies with their comrades from Iowa, Illinois, and Kansas.

"Governor Gamble claimed more immediate command of the 'E. M. M.'— the enrolled militia of Missouri, with which these 'Missouri State militia' seem to have been confounded—

"but as to the 'M. S. M.' my authority was considered absolute, even to the extent of prohibiting this force from meddling with any protection of a master over his slaves. And no troops, as a class, were more loyal and devoted to the cause and means adopted to destroy the rebellion.

"There was only a sort of implied agreement that this corps should, as far as convenient, be kept in and near Missouri; but whenever service required it, I sent them beyond our State lines, and never heard a murmur of objection.

"Surely these troops are entitled to bounties and the grateful consideration of our country.

"Respectfully yours,

S. R. CURTIS, Major General."

I have also a letter of General Rosecrans to the same effect, and a letter of General Clinton B. Fisk, of General J. W. Davidson, of General Herron, and of all other commanders who ever commanded these troops. There is one difficulty in the resolution, and that is that it makes no appropriation whatever; and I suppose it is now too late to undertake to amend it in that respect. It is only a mere declaration that these troops shall be put upon an equal footing with other troops, and it will require a subsequent appropriation in order to get any money. It does not, therefore, amount to anything in its present shape.

Mr. DIXON. I ask the Senator how large an appropriation will be required.

Mr. HENDERSON. There were ten regiments of troops, ten thousand men, to be paid a bounty of $100 each. Five hundred of them have already received it, leaving nine thousand five hundred to be paid.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator will allow me to suggest that it seems to me the question whether they were State troops or United States troops is a question of fact rather than a question of law, and it depends simply on the fact whether they were or were not mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. DRAKE. They were mustered in.

Mr. HOWE. I do not see the evidence of it from the papers read; and if they were mustered into the service of the United States, I do not see any possibility for any misunderstanding as to their rights.

Mr. DRAKE. It is only under the decision of the Solicitor of the War Department, as I understand my colleague to say.

Mr. HOWE. But the decision of the Solicitor is based upon the allegation that they were not in fact mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. DRAKE. But I understand my colleague to say that when he made that decision the Solicitor overlooked the law of the United States in regard to them.

Mr. HOWE. But the law did not muster them into the service. If they were mustered in, it was by the act of a mustering officer, and not by statute; but the Senator has not read to us the statute on which he relies to establish the national character of these troops.

Mr. HENDERSON. I said that I would read the law as soon as I could turn to it. I have it now before me. It is in these words; I read from the act of February 13, 1862:

"That no volunteers or militia from any State or Territory shall be mustered into the service of the United States on any terms or conditions confining their service to the limits of said State or Territory, or their vicinities, beyond the number of ten thousand in the State of Missouri, and four thousand five hundred in the State of Maryland, heretofore authorized by the President of the United States, or Secretary of War, to be raised in said States."

Mr. HOWE. Let me suggest to the Senator that that would by implication perhaps authorize these ten regiments to be mustered into the service of the United States upon an agreement that they should not be sent beyond the limits of the State, but does not establish the fact that they were, any one of them, mustered into the service of the United States; and it does establish the fact that, if they were mustered in at all, they were mustered in upon the express understanding that they should not be sent beyond the limits of the State; they were to be troops confined to the service of Missouri, and only serving the national interests so far as the national interests were concerned in the defense of Missouri.

Mr. HENDERSON. These troops, the Senate will observe, were not mustered into the service of the State of Missouri, but they were mustered into the service of the United States according to my view of the subject. They could not otherwise have been paid under our laws. From time to time, during their three years and four months of service, they were paid from appropriations made under the laws of Congress. They were paid by the paymasters of the United States Army. How in the world they were ever borne upon the rolls and paid every month or two by the paymasters of the United States Army I am at a loss to know, unless they were in the service of the United States. They were raised under an order of Mr. Stanton, the Secretary of War. They were United States troops to all intents and purposes, with the exception of a provision in the order raising them, and that, the Senate will observe, was to prevent their being taken out of Missouri, as our former troops had been taken, because we had raised our full quota before; but when our troops got into difficulty in Kentucky and Tennessee our State was deprived of its volunteers, not only those that the State had raised, but those who had come from Wisconsin so generously to help us, and we found ourselves with an invasion entering the southwest corner of the State, and without any defense at all, and then these troops were raised upon the implied promise that they would not be sent down into Tennessee and other sections of the country unless we could spare them. That was the agreement. Now, I will state that these troops were organized and put into the service under the act of July, 1861. They could never have been put into the service otherwise. These troops never considered that they had a right to object to going out of the State. To be sure, there was a sort of implied agreement to that effect, but it very soon became necessary for them to leave the State, and they always went whenever called upon. Some of these troops fought in almost every battle in the West. They were at Prairie Grove and at Pea Ridge, and, as General Curtis says, numbers of them left their bones on those battle-fields side by side with the troops of other States. I never heard an objection made to their going out of the State; and here is the report of every commander under whom they served, sent by Mr. Stanton, upon that subject. Clearly if any troops are entitled to bounty these are.

Mr. HOWE. I make no objection to the payment of these troops simply because their service was confined to the State of Missouri. If the United States offered to accept their services on those terms, it was perfectly legitimate to do so. I do not think it was discreet to do so, but they had a right to do so, and it ought not to prejudice the rights of these regiments. But if the Senator makes it clear that they were borne on the rolls and were paid by our officers, he has established the fact conclusively that they were mustered into the military service of the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. Surely so. The State never paid them a dollar.

Mr. HOWE. It nowhere appears on the face of the papers that they were so enrolled or so paid.

Mr. HENDERSON. They never could have got into the service otherwise.

Mr. HOWE. If it is within the personal knowledge of the Senator from Missouri that they were so borne on the rolls and so paid I am satisfied.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am satisfied that they served three years and four months and that the State of Missouri never paid them. The quartermaster's department transported them from place to place, and they were considered in all respects on an equal footing with all other troops of the United States, with the bare exception of the implied agreement at the time they were enlisted that they should be confined in their operations to the State of Missouri, but that was not respected, and it was utterly void. Mr. Lincoln never had any authority to muster troops into service under such an agreement. The act of 1861 provided that troops might be mustered into the service in a certain way; but when once mustered in under the statute they could be ordered anywhere, and these troops so regarded it. It never was understood that they were not bound to go under the orders of their commanders, and they went wherever they were ordered, and they did not consider that they had a right to object. In all respects they are as much entitled to bounty as any troops that served.

The truth of the matter is that they did more valuable service in our State than any other troops raised in the State; I will not say better than any troops that came from other States to assist us, but in comparing their services with those of other troops raised in our State I am frank to say that they rendered us more valuable service than any other troops.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why?

Mr. HENDERSON. Because they were the best class of men. They were the very best class of soldiers, as testified to by the certificates of the various officers who had them in charge, sent here by the Secretary of War, and from which I have read.

But it will be observed that this resolution is a mere declaration that they are upon an equal footing with other troops in that respect; it does not appropriate a dollar. It will be clearly within the discretion of Congress hereafter, when making appropriations, to appropriate or not pay these bounties. I suppose, of course, it will be regarded as a sort of implied obligation that Congress shall provide an appropriation to pay the bounties; but they are not bound to do it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the expression "also all those borne on the rolls as slaves." What does that mean?

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not particular about retaining that clause. I have no objection to its being stricken out. There are but few of that class. The Senator is familiar with the legislation which provided for paying the owners of slaves $300 for their slaves who enlisted. That has been repealed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not yet; and we may have to pay both.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state what this means. I suppose that legislation will be repealed; but this means that the slaves themselves shall be paid $100 bounty, instead of the masters being paid $300; and that being the case, Congress will make money by passing the resolution. Instead of paying each owner in Missouri $300 for his slave, if you pay $100 to the slave himself you will make money, and you can even out of the surplus funds pay the bounty to these ten regiments, and still save money.

Mr. FESSENDEN. When that provision of law is repealed, as probably it will be, I shall have no objection to this clause standing as it is; but while that stands unrepealed I do not want the Government to be called upon to pay bounty both to the master and to the slave.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to striking out that part of the resolution and letting it rest, to be settled by a subsequent resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. After this explanation, I have no objection to the resolution with that amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "also all those borne on the rolls as slaves."

Mr. THAYER. I rise simply to add a word in support of the reports which have been read from different officers in regard to these troops. I can speak from personal knowledge that no troops rendered more efficient service to the cause of the United States than these ten regiments, both out of the State and in the State of Missouri. They were regarded as a part of the United States forces, and never considered as a mere State force. To withhold what is asked for them, that is, placing them on the same footing with other troops of the United States, would be doing them a great wrong.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. CORBETT. Before the resolution is passed I should like to make a suggestion. Does not this open a very wide range for every State to bring in bills for the payment of its troops? I have no doubt that this claim is very proper and very just; but the question in my mind is, whether by adopting this resolution we should not involve the Government in very great expense, and largely increase our debt. As I understand it, the Senator from Ohio has proposed an amendment that troops of Ohio shall be included; and I understand that many other States furnished troops in a similar manner. I know that California furnished troops for three years or during the war. I have no doubt that all these States will bring in their claims; and it seems to me that the passage of this resolution will involve us in a very heavy expense and tend to increase the debt of the Government very materially.

Whether it would not be as cheap for the States themselves to pay these expenses instead of adding to the national debt by the national Government providing for all the troops raised by the several States, is a question for the Senate to determine. I am inclined to think that it would be better for the States to provide for these volunteers. The debt of our nation is very large, and it appears to be constantly increasing, and all these bills tend to the swelling of the large amount with which this Government is already burdened.

I wished merely to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if we adopt this measure there will be a large class of claims presented here for the reimbursement of the several States for expenses incurred during the war for their State troops. I wish to do justice to the troops of Missouri and every other State, but as a matter of policy I am almost inclined to vote against this proposition, because it is opening the door to a large class of claims that will be presented to the Government for payment.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator from Oregon if he has carefully examined this measure?

Mr. CORBETT. I have not; but I understand that these troops have rendered efficient service. I understand also that there are troops in the same position which were raised by Ohio.

Mr. WILSON. I beg the Senator's pardon. There is nothing of that kind in the resolution. This resolution refers to a class of troops raised under a special act in 1862, ten thousand in Missouri and four thousand five hundred in Maryland, authorized by President Lincoln; and this joint resolution refers only to the troops raised under that act, and can be applied to no others. The Maryland troops, in fact, have been paid the bounty, and this resolution only provides for the Missouri troops. If the Senator had read the joint resolution carefully, and then read the law of 1862, I think he would never have made his suggestion.

Mr. CORBETT. I ask the Senator if this is not the same measure to which the Senator from Ohio offered an amendment?

Mr. WILSON. No. It has nothing to do with it. This is a special thing to meet a special case.

Mr. CORBETT. Then I have misapprehended the proposition.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that an amendment has been made to this joint resolution depriving the colored soldiers of Missouri of any bounty. I should like to know how that can be justified.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It becomes the duty of the Chair at this time to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. POMEROY. I will not interrupt the taking of a vote on this measure.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state to the Senator from Kansas that the reason the amendment was made to which he alludes was simply this: slaves were enlisted under a special law by which we agreed to pay their masters a certain sum, and that question is still pending. This is a mere bounty. If we have to pay two bounties, one to the master and the other to the slave, it will make a case that does not exist in regard to any other troops. I have no objection to paying the bounty to the slaves if we have not got to pay it to their masters; but as the law now stands we must pay the masters.

Mr. POMEROY. I very much prefer to pay the slave.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I agree with the Senator on that point; but we cannot pay them both.

Mr. HENDERSON. Another reason why the clause as to slaves should be stricken out of this resolution is that it is a proposition to pay slaves generally. I do not know how many slaves were "borne upon the rolls." It does not apply to the slaves of Missouri alone, but to slaves generally.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 29) to extend to the employés of the quartermaster's and subsistence departments at Washington the provisions of the joint resolution giving additional compensation to certain employés in the civil service at Washington, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 61) to provide for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 16) fixing the rate of duty on umbrellas and on spiral wire furniture springs, and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

REPORTS ON THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. ANTHONY obtained the floor.

Mr. POMEROY. I call for the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is now before the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. I will state that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] is willing to withdraw his amendment to it this morning, and we can pass it without debate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have the floor, and I hope I shall be allowed to make a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor, but the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a report, which I have been trying to make for three or four days.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print five thousand copies of the report of General Humphreys on the physics and hydraulics of the Mississippi river, &c., have instructed me to report it back with an amendment. The committee thought that printing this book at this time, which would cost some eighteen thousand dollars, was too expensive, and they have therefore instructed me to report against printing that, but in favor of printing the supplementary report, which will be comparatively inexpensive, and to which I believe the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] who was very anxious upon this matter, assents. The amendment is to strike out the heavy appropriation and merely to print the smaller work. I ask for the present consideration of the report.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I shall not object to that if it leads to no discussion.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That five thousand copies each be printed for the use of the Senate of the following documents, to wit:

1. Report upon the physics and hydraulics of the Mississippi river; upon the protection of the alluvial region against overflow; and upon the deepening of the mouths, based upon surveys and investigations made under the acts of Congress directing the topographical and hydrographical survey of the delta of the Mississippi river, &c., submitted to the Bureau of Topographical Engineers, War Department, under date of August 5, 1861, as prepared by Captain A. A. Humphreys and Lieutenant H. L. Abbott; and
2. The report of Brigadier General A. A. Humphreys on the same subject, submitted to the Secretary of War under date of May 31, 1866.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Printing was to strike out all after the word "Resolved" and to insert:

That five thousand copies be printed for the use of the Senate of the report of Brigadier General A. A. Humphreys on the subject of the levees of the Mississippi river, submitted to the Secretary of War under date of May 31, 1866.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

LATE SUPERINTENDENT OF PRINTING.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am also directed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution, and to ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to inquire if there be any deficit in the accounts of the late Superintendent of Public Printing, and if any purchases of paper or other material were made by him in violation of law or willfully to the prejudice of the public interest.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. As it is probable that it will be impracticable to pursue this investigation at this session, I think it is only justice to an officer who has been connected with the Government that I should read a letter from him addressed to me, which has induced me to offer this resolution:

WASHINGTON, March 20, 1867.

Sir: During the past week the newspapers have contained statements concerning myself which are calculated to make an unfavorable impression upon the public mind. I allude to the report that I am a defaulter to the Government; that I made heavy purchases while in office in violation of law, &c.

Believing these reports to be willful perversions of facts; knowing them to be untrue in each and every particular; confident of my ability to remove any doubt of my integrity as an officer of the Government; and feeling it to be due to the Government as well as to myself that this matter should be examined into, I take the liberty to ask you to do me the favor to bring the subject before the honorable body of which you are a member, that such an investigation may be had as will lead to the truth or falsity of these rumors.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

C. WENDELL.

Late Superintendent of Public Printing.

Hon. H. B. ANTHONY,

Chairman Committee on Printing.

There is upon our desks a communication from the Congressional Printer, in reply to a resolution of the House, which I suppose it is not improper for me to refer to in this connection, in which it is stated that certain purchases of paper were made in November last, and if that paper had been purchased under the price and at the weight of the last contract there would have been a saving to the Government of $72,000; and the impression has gone forth that that amount was improperly given to favored parties. A large portion of this $72,000 would have been saved by the reduction in the weight of the paper. Under the last contract the committee have reduced the weight of the paper materially, which will make a saving to the Government of forty or fifty thousand dollars annually, and would make up perhaps fifteen thousand dollars of this sum of $72,000. The paper could not have been bought at that time except under the old contract price, because the contractors agree to furnish all that the Government wants, and the Government agrees to take it at the contract price. If paper is sold upon a falling market, the Government loses; if upon a rising market, the contractor loses. At the time this paper was bought the price in open market was about two cents under the contract price, and it has since fallen five cents more; so that a large portion of this sum could not have been saved, because the Government was obliged to buy the paper, and had contracted for the price of it. Whether the Superintendent of Public Printing bought more paper than he should have bought is the subject of this inquiry. Upon that I have no information, and of course can give no opinion; but I thought it was fair, as this investigation is to be ordered, and as it probably cannot be made at this session, that his statement should go to the public with the allegations that have been made against him. The resolution was adopted.

SALE OF SHIPS TO BELLIGERENTS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a report from the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it, if there be no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a memorial of ship-builders, ship-owners, merchants, and others of New York, praying that the law be so amended as to allow the sale and employment of American vessels by friendly belligerents, have directed me to report a bill in accordance with the prayer of the petitioners; and if there be no objection, I will ask to put the bill on its passage.

The bill (S. No. 94) declaratory of the law in regard to the sale of ships to friendly belligerents was read and passed to a second reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider this bill at the present time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the unfinished business is only laid aside informally, and this bill gives rise to no discussion, I have no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I feel it my duty to state here that this subject was referred—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If this bill is to lead to discussion, I must insist on going on with the unfinished business.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not wish to discuss it, but merely to make a statement. This subject was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and was considered by them yesterday. The committee came to the conclusion that at this time, under the peculiar circumstances of the case and bearing in view pending negotiations and claims of the United States, it was not expedient to recommend any legislation thereon. The committee did not direct me to make any report on the subject, but the bill that was referred to them is now on their files in the room below. I make this statement that the Senate may be aware that the subject has already had the consideration of another committee. I do not intend, however, at this moment to make any opposition.

Mr. CHANDLER. This memorial has been before the Committee on Commerce since the 9th of February. How it came before another committee I know not. It does not belong to any other committee. It belongs to the Committee on Commerce, and has been acted upon by them. But as the bill may lead to discussion I will allow it to go over, and give notice that I shall call it up at an early day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go upon the Calendar.

CLAIMS OF LOYAL TENNESSEANS.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. Some days ago I offered a resolution on the subject of the payment of the loyal people of Tennessee for commissary and quartermaster stores taken and used by the Federal Army during the war, which was adopted. After the adoption of the resolution my friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] moved a reconsideration with a view to modify the language of the resolution. I have no objection to the reconsideration to the end that he may suggest the modification he desires. I simply ask to have the subject referred to the committee, though I do not require any action at the present session. I hope the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on reconsidering the vote on the adoption of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the resolution be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of paying the loyal people of Tennessee for the commissary and quartermasters' stores taken and used by the Federal Army in that State during the late war, and to report a bill authorizing the President of the United States to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission, consisting of three gentlemen, one of whom at least shall be learned in the law, whose duty it shall be to investigate such claims for commissary and quartermasters' stores taken and used by the Federal Army during the late war as may be presented to them by the loyal people of Tennessee, and authorizing said commission to give vouchers for the same in all cases where such claims are found to be correct and just.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend that portion of the resolution requiring the committee to report a bill authorizing the appointment of a commission by striking out the word "report" and inserting "inquire into the expediency of reporting."

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I accept the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 95) to amend the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2 1867; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask for the reading of the bill at length.

The Secretary read the bill. It proposes to repeal the first clause of the second section of the bankrupt law, which requires the appointment of registers in bankruptcy to be made by the judges of the district courts upon the nomination and recommendation of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is to be the duty of the several district courts of the United States to appoint in each congressional district within their respective districts one or more registers in bankruptcy to assist the court and the judge in the performance of their duties under the act, and all the provisions of the act in relation to registers in bankruptcy are to apply to the registers so appointed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall not ask to have this bill referred. I will state that in introducing this bill I consider myself authorized to say that it meets the approval of the Chief Justice, who thinks that this is imposing an unusual burden upon him, and it is with his approbation and approval that I introduce it. I ask to have it go upon the Calendar. I shall desire to call it up as soon as an opportunity offers.

Mr. CONNESS and others. Call it up now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Several Senators say, "Let us pass it now." If Senators will agree to it, I should like to have it considered.

Mr. FOWLER. I hope it will not be called up at the present time.

Mr. POMEROY. The bill may be entirely satisfactory to the Chief Justice, and yet not satisfactory to everybody else.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well; let it go upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill cannot be considered today.

WRAPPING-PAPER.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to reconsider the vote on the passage of House bill No. 72, which was passed a short time ago. I wish to have it reconsidered with a view to offer an amendment from the Committee on Finance, which, on a moment's explanation, everybody will agree to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 72) to exempt wrapping-paper made from wood or corn-stalks from internal tax.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to reconsider the vote ordering the bill to a third reading.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If this is to lead to any discussion I shall be compelled to insist on the unfinished business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I presume there will be no discussion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think the unfinished business had better be disposed of one way or the other.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the following amendment to the bill as an additional section from the Committee on Finance:

And be it further enacted, That every national banking association, State bank, banker, or association shall pay a tax of ten per cent. on the amount of the notes of any town, city, or municipal corporation paid out by them after the 1st day of May, 1867, to be collected in the mode and manner in which the tax on the notes of State banks is collected.

If any Senator wishes an explanation of the amendment, I will send to the desk a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency. It is merely to extend the same tax to shiplasters issued by certain southern cities that is imposed on the notes of State banks. Perhaps the letter of the Comptroller had better be read. That will explain it.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
WASHINGTON, March 21, 1867.

DEAR SIR: Our National Bank Examiners in St. Louis, Memphis, and New Orleans report that the city authorities at those points issue scrip or "shiplasters," payable to bearer, to circulate as money. Notices of this practice have also appeared in print.

I inclose a printed slip out from a southern newspaper, and also a letter from the German National Bank of Memphis, in reference to the practice.

Section seventy-two of the internal revenue act, passed March 3, 1865, and amended July 13, 1866, imposes a tax of ten per cent. upon the notes of any person, State bank, or State banking association, paid out by any incorporated bank after August 1, 1866.

But this is not broad enough to cover the case in question. These cities can flood their respective sections with irredeemable shiplasters without limitation.

I do not know of any way to prevent their issue and circulation except by taxation, and I suggest whether the subject is not one of sufficient importance to warrant a special amendment to the act in order to reach the case?

May I ask your consideration of this matter?

Very respectfully yours,

H. R. HULBURD, Comptroller.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, United States Senator.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to amend the bill by adding the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That ladders manufactured in whole or in part from wood shall be entitled to the exemption provided for in section eleven of the act entitled "An act to amend existing laws relating to internal revenue, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is perhaps ungracious to object to this amendment; but there will be no end to these exemptions if we begin to tolerate them in this manner. I would have much preferred not to exempt any kind of wrapping-paper with which this bill commences. I think it is an article that ought to be subject to tax; but having exempted that made from straw, it was certainly eminently proper that we should go on and exempt that made from wood and corn-stalks. Now, if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois, which is in substance a bill that passed the House, shall be adopted, there are more than fifty articles that can come in with the same propriety. Ladders made of wood is the subject. Those do not compete with any other article. There are many things which ought to be exempted in preference to these. If we are going to exempt articles made of wood, why not exempt shoe-pegs? Why not exempt furniture? We could go into more than a hundred articles that have claims paramount to this one. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will not adopt the proposition; and for another reason, that the revenues—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I must insist on the unfinished business, as this matter is leading to debate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have but a single word to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont has the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. When the Senator has finished, another Senator will want to reply.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The revenues of the Department are diminishing day by day, and there is not going to be anything like the amount that was anticipated, either from customs or internal revenue. I think that we cannot with any propriety diminish the amount of revenue of the Government at this session.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I must insist, as this bill is evidently leading to a discussion, that we shall go on with the unfinished business. The unfinished business was only informally laid aside to allow this proposition in regard to shiplasters to pass, supposing it would take no time; and now we have got up the tariff question. I must insist on the unfinished business, unless a vote can be taken without further debate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope we shall be allowed to take a vote on this bill. If not, I shall move to postpone the unfinished business. It is important that this bill should be acted upon.

Mr. CONNESS. I intend, when the unfinished business is taken up, to make a test question on recommitting it to the committee, where it ought to go.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; then I hope we shall be allowed to finish this matter now. The proposition to exempt ladders is rather a small one I think.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator will not object to it. I have a little statement that I desire to submit in regard to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will not encumber this bill with it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Vermont will both consent to it. I will state why I suppose this bill passed the House. This is a House bill that I have offered as an amendment, containing a single section—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As I have cut short the honorable Senator from Vermont—and I cannot cut short one Senator without insisting as against others—I must insist on proceeding with the unfinished business.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I will move that the unfinished business be postponed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator has not the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, the Senator from Illinois has not the floor. The unfinished business comes up.

Mr. CONNESS. Who has the floor?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was entitled to the floor on the unfinished business, and gave way informally that certain matters might be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand that the unfinished business was informally passed over. Motions were made by unanimous consent to proceed to other business, and the Senate accordingly proceeded to consider many bills and motions. I understand, though I may be wrong, that the unfinished business of yesterday has gone over by common consent, and can only be taken up by a motion to that effect.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If that be so, I will proceed with my statement. I am in order I suppose.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state to the Chair that when the Chair called up the unfinished business I had the floor, and was about to make a statement before withdrawing the amendment that I offered yesterday. Gentlemen appealed to me to give way informally for matters that would lead to no debate, and I have repeatedly stated, as those questions came up, that if they would not displace the unfinished business, I was willing that they should be taken up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will give way for five minutes we shall get through with this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has stated his understanding, and it must be appealed from to be got rid of.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not propose to appeal from the decision.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then, I believe I am entitled to the floor. I understand the reason for passing this little bill was this: in the manufacture of ladders it is the work that makes them valuable; nearly the whole value of the ladder consists in making it; and we have exempted in the internal revenue law most articles of wooden-ware; I think nearly all. This matter was thought to be of sufficient importance to authorize its exemption by the House; and I have a letter explaining it which I will read, as it is short:

CHICAGO, March 8, 1867.

DEAR SIR: In reading the amended revenue tax bill just passed I am surprised that ladders of all kinds are not included in the list of articles exempted from taxation, as about everything else made of wood is included in the bill. Probably the article was not thought of by any member of Congress, or it would have been named in the list.

Within a few years past several factories have been started in different cities of the Union, making the manufacture of ladders an exclusive business, and by this means this class of goods have been much improved; but we have been so heavily taxed on all materials used, as well as on the article when sold, that it has been a precarious business. Now, that the tax has been removed from the entire class of wooden articles, with the exception of ladders, I have felt that to ask you would so get your influence to amend the law so as to include ladders of all kinds. Hoping you will consider an amendment of the kind an act of justice, and labor to secure it,

I am truly yours,

C. G. UDELL.

Hon. NORMAN B. JUDD.

This gentleman is a manufacturer of ladders, it seems, at Chicago. Most other wooden articles have been exempted, and there can certainly be no distinction between this and the making of barrels and churns and casks and broom-handles and things of that kind. I hope, as it is a small matter, the Senate will suffer it to go on this bill, as they have made an amendment to it, and the bill must go back to the House at any rate. It can affect the revenue but very little.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, called for a division on the amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senate will adopt this amendment. If Senators will not vote, I shall have to call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now, as the yeas and nays are to be called, I hope Senators will understand this sufficiently to give their votes upon it. We have exempted in the internal revenue bill nearly every article of wooden-ware from taxation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Great numbers we have not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Nearly all, the chief value of which consists in the labor upon them. It is so stated in this letter which I have just read to the Senate, and I presume it is correct. Now, it is proposed to exempt ladders. A bill for that purpose has passed the House of Representatives. We have got up a bill exempting wrapping-paper, which we have amended. It has got to go back to the House at any rate, and this is another bill that passed the House exempting ladders. The House was so well satisfied of the propriety of it that they passed a separate bill on the subject. It may just as well be put on here with wrapping-paper, and disposed of in that way. The Senator from Vermont objects to it. I hope the Senate will allow the manufacture of ladders to be exempted from taxation, as casks and churns and barrels and wooden brushes and broom-handles and tanks and almost all things made of wood are exempted, and certainly there can be no reason why ladders should not share the fate of the others. That is all there is of it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is hardly worth while on so small a question to argue it, but we are constantly whittling away the resources of the Treasury, so that at last there will be but a very inconsiderable sum left. Now, it is true that we have exempted some articles of wooden-ware; many of them without any propriety. It first began with exempting casks, and then was extended to barrels, and then to tubs and pails, and it has constantly grown until it has in fact included the larger proportion of manufactures made of wood; but yet there are many articles that are still left subject to tax; for instance, mop-handles; and I could mention many other articles. I do not see why we should go on in this manner. I know that it is very difficult for gentlemen to resist the importunities of those who happen to have an establishment in their districts that ask for an exemption of taxation upon manufactures that exist there. It is through these personal importunities that we are compelled to make these various amendments reducing the revenue. I trust that this amendment will not be adopted, because if we adopt this we must certainly go much further.

In relation to these ladders, there are many of them that are made to be used in mercantile establishments, and made with a good deal of art, nicely finished; and therefore, if we exempt ladders made of wood, we should exempt all of that class. We have another class of ladders that are made partly of wood and partly of iron. The next claim that will come in will be to exempt those. I trust we shall not adopt the amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mop-handles are usually made partly of iron. These ladders, I believe, are made entirely of wood.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Many mop-handles are made exclusively of wood.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, you can exempt wooden mop-handles if you desire to do so. I have no objection to it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not desire it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to read over the list of exemptions, as the Senator from Vermont makes a point on this matter and thinks the revenues of the country will be lost if we do not tax a ladder, a thing that is needed by every farmer in the country. I know the policy adopted in the Senate was to exempt articles of this kind. Now, I will read over what is made free:

Casks, churns, barrels, wooden-brushes, and broom-handles.

Broom-handles are in if mop-handles are not.

Tank, and kits made of wood, including coopersage of all kinds, bungs and plugs, packing-boxes, nest-boxes, and match-boxes, whether made of wood or other materials; wooden hames, plow beams, split-bottom chairs, and turned materials for the same, unmanufactured, and saddle-trees made of wood, and match-boxes heretofore made on which a tax has not been paid.

Horse-rakes, horse-powers, tedders, hames, scythes, snaths, hay-forks, hoes, and portable grinding mills.

Potato-hooks, pitchforks, manure and spading forks.

Pumps, garden engines, and hydraulic rams.

Sleds, wheelbarrows, and hand-carts, and fence made of wood.

Now, sir, all these articles are exempted, and certainly ladders come within the purview of these articles. But the Senator from Vermont gets up and gravely appeals to the Senate that you are constantly diminishing the revenue. Why, sir, we have a great deal more revenue than we know what to do with.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. We shall not have this year.

Mr. TRUMBULL. You have more money in the Treasury than you know what to do with; and you have got there now one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty million dollars in cash. The people have demanded that there should be a reduction of this taxation. But when a bill to exempt ladders, which has passed the House, comes up here, the Senator from Vermont insists that the revenues of the country will be lost if we agree to it. If the Senate think so they can vote it down. I shall take up no more time about it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will ask my friend from Illinois if he will accept an amendment which I will propose, to strike out the word "ladders" and insert "all articles made of wood?"

Mr. TRUMBULL. Wooden-ware?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Wooden-ware. I am sure all these are embraced in the argument, and I really do not see why, after the long list of wooden manufactures exempted, it should not apply to the whole as well as a part.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should have no objection to that. That is not the House bill, but I think it should be so, as I think it would embrace scarcely any other article.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then I move to strike out "ladders" and to insert "all articles manufactured of wood."

Mr. DIXON. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois to include sewing-machines. They are an important article that I think ought to be exempted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In the second line of the amendment it is proposed to strike out the word "ladders" and insert "all articles;" so as to read:

That all articles manufactured, in whole or in part, from wood, shall be entitled to the exemption, &c.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That will not do.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine whether that will include nutmegs made from wood? [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think it would.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator on my right [Mr. FERRY] is anxious about it.

Mr. WILSON. And include wooden hams also. [Laughter.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator from Illinois, judging from his speech, did not intend to have these articles exempted that were made partly of iron, and I move to strike out the words "in whole or in part" in his amendment, and to insert the word "wholly;" so that it will read, "that ladders manufactured wholly from wood shall be entitled to the exemption," &c.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois modifies his amendment in that way.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think this is very careless legislation, and I really hope the amendment will not be adopted. I do not feel disposed to argue it; but the disposition is very strong to legislate hap-hazard, without knowing where it is going or what it will touch one way or the other. If a matter is brought in here for a specific reason, which reason is given, the disposition is on all these questions to pile on something else, without knowing what the effect is to be. I have heard the argument before as to the surplus now in the Treasury, and I do not feel disposed to discuss that. I really think the Senate had better not legislate in the dark in this way, at hap-hazard, in making these exemptions from taxation. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. CAMERON. I trust this whole proposition will be voted down. I think it wrong to legislate for a special purpose or for the benefit of particular individuals in this way. I take it that this is offered for the benefit of some manufacturer in Chicago or along there. We shall have our whole revenue system destroyed if Senators come forward at a moment like this with propositions for special cases. When we legislate upon the currency or the revenue of the country we should take time to deliberate upon it. Every proposition like this interferes with the whole system and affects the whole country. I trust that at this time at least, at the end of the session, we shall not begin a new system.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know of the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Maine if their argument does not go to the whole bill. What is the bill? The bill is to exempt a particular article which the Senator from Vermont is advocating. He is not afraid that the Government will be bankrupted and our revenues diminished if we exempt wrapping-paper. He goes for that. That is his bill. Now, I want to know if you can exempt one article in that way, whether the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania does not go to that as well as the other?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to ask the Senator if there is not a difference. A motion is made by the Senator from Vermont to exempt one kind of paper made of one material, because we have exempted another kind of paper made of another material, with which it would come in competition. That is the reason given, and seems to be a fair reason.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The reason given here is that you have exempted one kind of wooden-ware, and why not another?

Mr. FESSENDEN. But do ladders come in competition with churns or with wooden pails or anything of that sort? If the Senator can convince me of that I will go with him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will ask the Senator from Maine if broom-handles come in competition with broom-handles?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a different question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. You have exempted broom-handles.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And therefore, the Senator says, we should exempt ladders! If the Senator will prove that ladders come in competition with broom-handles or churns, I will yield to the force of the argument.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senate exempts wooden-ware, the chief value of which consists in the labor put upon it, I want to know if ladders do not come within that reason? The argument of the Senators who are alarmed about the revenue goes to the whole bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply desire to make a statement. These two propositions are not very important; and that they are here I suppose grows out of the fact that they have no Committee of Ways and Means organized in the House, and interested parties there move that certain articles be exempted, and pass a bill. The bill which was called up by the Senator from Vermont simply provides that where wrapping-paper is made of wood it shall not be taxed, as wrapping-paper made of straw is free. That is just and proper; because the tax is a discrimination against a new kind of wrapping-paper which is being made out of wood and other material. I think that is right, although it is rather an insignificant matter, and might just as well have been provided for at the last session or the next session. I took occasion, however, as this bill was pending, to correct a very important abuse that has grown up in the southern cities in supplying the people with shinplasters. Now, the Senator proposes to add an exemption in favor of ladders. The Committee on Finance considered that subject, and they thought it was too small to enter upon at this session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How about this other matter?

Mr. SHERMAN. That was a case of injustice, where a discrimination was made against wrapping-paper made of wood rather than of straw; and therefore, although it was a small matter, it was a case of injustice. All the people who make ladders will pay the same tax, and therefore there will be no injustice done, and the matter may go over until the next session. The whole thing is of but little importance, and I do not think we should waste time on it. I presume at the next session we shall be prepared to exempt ladders, and perhaps many other things.

Mr. CAMERON. The argument in favor of exempting paper made from wood is that it is a new interest, scarcely yet understood. But a few manufactories have been established, and they are just beginning to make the article. It comes in competition with wrapping-paper made from straw, and it is therefore right, inasmuch as that article is exempt, that this should be exempt also. It is not so with ladders. Anybody can make a ladder. I suppose the Senator from Illinois could make one himself if he had great need for it. I believe I could do so certainly. But the manufacture of paper from wood does require relief, and it is right that it should receive it until we understand the proper mode of manufacturing the article.

The amendment was rejected.

The amendment of Mr. SHERMAN was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we had better vote the bill down now.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the title was amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

YEARS OF JOHN E. BOULIGNY.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 8, in reference to the Bouligny case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is very important, and I think we had better take it up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It will be remembered that two days ago I got the attention of the Senate to the House joint resolution suspending the operations of the commissioners who are assessing damages for slaves enlisted in the Army in certain States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is a very important matter, and will take but a moment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It was then put over at the instance of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS.] Yesterday the Senate was occupied all day with other business, and it was impossible to get attention to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You can take it up in a few moments. This is very important, and it is a House resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is also a resolution suspending the operation of a bill passed at the last session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) directing the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the execution of a law passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouigny.

The preamble recites that during the last hours of the Thirty-Ninth Congress an act was passed, without discussion, for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouigny, granting to them land warrants for seventy-five thousand eight hundred and forty acres of land; and that by the solemn judgment and decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, after full hearing, it was in the year 1858 adjudged that the private land claim on which the act is based was invalid, null, and void; and that Mr. Justice Nelson, who delivered the opinion of the court, declared that there was no record evidence of any such land grant as was set up, "that none had been produced, though a thorough examination of the archives of that date, both at New Orleans and Paris, had been made, and no records could be found;" and that it was also declared by Judge Nelson that there was not the "slightest ground for the claim set up" to a tract of land running back from the Mississippi river to the Atchafalaya, and that, at the most, the petitioners could not claim, under any grant or survey, over two thousand five hundred or three thousand acres, instead of about half a million, the report of which decision is found in 15 Howard's Reports, page 14; and that this private land claim, after full review by Hon. M. Burchard, Solicitor of the General Land Office, in 1838, was declared as invalid and void; and that this pretended private land claim had its origin in 1717, and was a part of the celebrated Mississippi scheme, with which John Law, known for his connection with the South Sea bubble, was a party; and that to revive and legalize this claim will revive and legalize claims to the amount of many million acres; and that there is grave reason for believing that the act was passed under a misapprehension of the facts. For these reasons, the resolution directs the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the execution of the law until the further order of Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think that preamble ought not to pass.

Mr. DRAKE. Certainly not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. When the bill the execution of which it is now proposed to suspend was under consideration here, the Senator from New York, not now a member of the body, Judge Harris, explained it to the Senate. I do not profess to understand it. I am not objecting to the resolution; but the recitals in the preamble are not true. The bill was explained to the Senate. Then there are a great many recitals in the preamble that I know nothing about. Perhaps the Senator from Oregon has examined them and knows their truth; but I happen to know personally that Judge Harris investigated the case and made a statement in regard to it when the bill was before the Senate. I think the preamble had better be stricken out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I supposed the recitals in the preamble were intended to refer to the proceedings in the other branch of Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It will not when passed; it will then refer to the proceedings here as well as there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So far as I am concerned, I have no particular fancy for any such preamble. The only reason I did not report in favor of striking out the preamble was because the joint resolution having already passed the House, I did not think it worth while at this stage of the session to send the resolution back to the House with any amendment. But the preamble amounts to nothing; so far as any practical effect is concerned, and I am willing to strike it out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to amend the joint resolution by striking out the preamble. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DRAKE. I should like, with regard to this matter, to inquire of the honorable Senator from Oregon whether he knows from investigation that there are facts which justify this suspension of an act of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will answer the Senator's question; but if he will excuse me, I desire first to have a verbal amendment made to the resolution, which is necessary in consequence of the preamble having been stricken out. It now reads:

That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to suspend the execution of said law until the further order of Congress.

I move to strike out the words "said law" and insert the title of the act with the date of its approval.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made, no objection being interposed.

Mr. DRAKE. I wish to know from the honorable Senator from Oregon whether from any investigation which the committee has made he is satisfied that the public interests require the suspension of action under this act of Congress, or whether the committee has acted merely upon the allegations contained in the preamble which the House of Representatives has adopted and sent to us. That is a point upon which I desire information.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that it can be regarded as a compliment to the committee to suppose that it has reported back this joint resolution and recommended its passage without any exemption, and simply because the preamble to the resolution contains certain recitals. I will say to the honorable Senator that the committee did examine the records and evidence submitted in this case, and came to the conclusion that the public interest and justice to the Government demanded the passage of the joint resolution now before the Senate; and I will make a brief statement of some of the grounds upon which the committee reached this conclusion.

I hold in my hand a statement on behalf of the heirs of J. B. Bernard Danterive, praying for the confirmation of a land claim in Louisiana called the "Bayou Goula Concession," which statement was made to the Committee on Private Land Claims of the House of Representatives. This statement, which consists not only of a narration of facts but an argument in favor of the claim, is as strong for the petitioners, no doubt, as the facts would warrant; and upon this "statement" it is very easy, in the view of the committee, to demonstrate that the bill which was passed at the last session of Congress was founded in a great mistake, and that it would work manifest injustice to the Government.

In 1717 the Mississippi Company, who had a charter from the King of France, made a concession to one Duvernay, which concession was located at some point upon the Mississippi river above the city of New Orleans; but there is no evidence in this record as to the exact location or boundary of that concession or grant. So far as that concession is concerned, it is correctly described in the opinion of the Supreme Court in a case reported in 15

Howard; and I will simply refer to that opinion, and read one or two extracts, to show the view of the Supreme Court as to the concession made to Duvernay. The court say:

"As it respects the first ground of title, the grant to Duvernay in 1717, no record of it has been produced, and after a thorough examination of the archives of that date, both at New Orleans and at Paris, and in the appropriate offices for the deposit of such records, none can be found. The only proof furnished is to be found in the historical sketches given to the public of the first settlement of Louisiana by the French Government, under the direction of the Western or Mississippi Company, together with some documentary evidence relating to the settlement of the plantation by Duvernay through his agents, such as powers of attorney and some intermediate transfers of the titles in the course of the agency. But unfortunately neither the historical sketches nor documentary evidence furnish any information as to the extent of the grant or its boundaries."

That statement of the Supreme Court is entirely borne out by the evidence submitted to the committee. Nowhere does it appear what the extent or boundaries of the grant were. In another place the Supreme Court say:

"And in the second place, the tract claimed as derived from Duvernay is without boundaries or location. The only description that has been referred to, or which we have been able to find after a pretty thorough search even in the historical records, is that it was a grant of a large tract upon the right branch of the Mississippi river, opposite Bayou Manchac, a point some thirty leagues above New Orleans."

The Supreme Court, in referring to that grant made by the Mississippi Company to Duvernay, say that there is no evidence as to its location, but the statement is that it is located somewhere on the Mississippi river above the city of New Orleans; and that there is no evidence as to the boundaries of that concession. No evidence was ever submitted to any tribunal as to the grant, and the only testimony in regard to it is derived from the allusions made in the history of the early settlement of Louisiana to such a concession; but it is assumed, and no doubt is true, that the Mississippi Company did make a certain grant to this man Duvernay. The "statement" of these claimants to the Committee on Private Land Claims of the House assumes that the concession to Duvernay extended four leagues up and down the Mississippi river, and back four leagues to the Atchafalaya river, so that according to the statement made in the petition the grant consisted of a tract of land about twelve miles square.

The committee to whom this subject was referred at the last session of Congress assumed that the heirs of Danterive were entitled to the whole of the grant made to Duvernay, which, according to this "statement," consisted of twelve miles square of land lying on the Mississippi river, and reported a bill providing that the heirs of Bouigny should have one sixth of that tract of land. If that be true that the petitioners are entitled to that entire tract of land according to the concession made to Duvernay, then the bill that was passed at the last session ought not to have passed, in the judgment of the present committee, for the reason that the bill of the last session assumed that this tract of land twelve miles square contained 455,040 acres of land, and the bill provides that one sixth of that, 75,840 acres, shall be granted to the heirs of Bouigny. It is perfectly manifest that in this there was a great mistake, for if that concession be a tract twelve miles square, then, according to the judgment of the committee, there can be in that tract only 92,160 acres of land instead of 455,040 acres. The tract only contains 92,160 acres, because there are but 640 acres in a square mile, and the tract being twelve miles square or 144 square miles, 640 multiplied by 144 gives 92,160 as the number of acres. The bill of last session proposes to give, as one sixth of that tract, to the heirs of Bouigny more than 75,000 acres of land, when the whole tract does not contain exceeding 100,000 acres of land. Taking the statement made in this petition, granting to the petitioners all they claim in it, they cannot make out that they are entitled altogether to more than 100,000 acres of land, and yet the bill assumes that within that tract there are 455,040 acres of land.

Mr. DRAKE. I am satisfied.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, Mr. President, I proceed further. I wish to show an additional reason for the action of the committee at this time. Extraordinary as it may seem, the petitioners in this case do not claim according to the Duvernay claim; but the facts are that after Louisiana passed from the hands of the French to the Spaniards, the Spanish Governor, O'Reilly, reduced this concession, after it had been conveyed to Dauterive, to the extent of twenty arpents front upon the Mississippi river. Subsequently Unzaga, the Spanish Governor who succeeded O'Reilly, returned to Dauterive twenty more arpents, making a tract of land forty arpents in extent upon the Mississippi river, and, according to the claim of the petitioners, extending back to the Atchafalaya river twelve miles. Now, to show that the present committee is not mistaken, I wish to refer simply to what is claimed here. I read from the "statement" of the petitioners:

"The concession as made to Paris Duvernay, and acquired by Dauterive, had four leagues front on the Mississippi, and ran back to the Atchafalaya. The claimants derive their information in relation to this extent of the grant from a written statement by Dauterive himself. It would perhaps be possible to ascertain the locality of the original grant by discovering the situation of another grant made on the 24 June, 1769, to Louis Dufosse, which is stated to be bounded by Dauterive, and which is recorded on folio 214 of the record of French concessions in this land office. But the size of this original grant is not now a subject of material inquiry, as the present claim is made under a confirmation by Governor Unzaga.

"On the 16th of August, 1769, O'Reilly arrived at New Orleans, (1 Martin's History, 362,) and after having reduced the inhabitants of that city to passive obedience, he visited in the middle of the month of December the settlements on the Mississippi as far as Pointe Coupée, (2 Martin's History, 36.) It seems that he there treated the property of the colonists in as despotic a manner as he had previously treated their persons. He reduced Dauterive's land to twenty arpents. It was an act of brutal violence, which could confer or destroy no right; but the claimants are compelled to submit to the effects of O'Reilly's order. These observations are made only to guard against any misconstruction of their present application, which is only for the confirmation of so much of the original grant as O'Reilly and Unzaga consented to leave to them."

This petition is full of statements to that effect, that they only claim according to the confirmation made by Unzaga. When Unzaga became Governor of the Territory of Louisiana he declared that Dauterive should have a tract of land extending forty arpents up and down the Mississippi river, and he ordered one Andry to survey that tract, which survey was made and returned to Unzaga, and approved by him, and that survey only shows that Dauterive is entitled to a tract of land of this width upon the Mississippi, and extending back to the Atchafalaya river, a distance of twelve miles; and it is only for the confirmation of this claim that the petitioners make application to Congress, and they expressly repudiate any claim founded upon the Duvernay grant, because that grant never was bounded or surveyed; no one ever knew its extent, and it has never been recognized by any subsequent Government; it was not recognized by the Spanish Government, and has not been recognized by the American Government. Now, assuming that the present claimants are entitled to one sixth of this grant, supposing it to be a mile wide upon the Mississippi river, and to extend back to the Atchafalaya river, a distance of twelve miles, the whole amount of land embraced within those boundaries would only be eight thousand and eighty acres, and one sixth of that would be thirteen hundred and forty-six acres of land; so that according to their own showing, by a simple application of arithmetic to the representations made in the "statement" of the petitioners, they are only entitled to thirteen hundred and forty-six acres of land, if they are entitled to anything, instead of to seventy-five thousand eight hundred and forty acres, as provided for in the bill passed at the last session of Congress; and the committee do not intend, as I understand by this report, to express any conclusive opinion as to the right of these petitioners to these thirteen hundred and forty-six acres of land, but they believe the bill passed at the last session of Congress is founded in a gross mistake and works great injury to the Government, and therefore its operation ought to be suspended until the further order of Congress. It may be a subsequent question, and it is a question about which, I must confess, there are still grave doubts as to whether these heirs are entitled to these thirteen hundred and forty-six acres.

Mr. JOHNSON. If I recollect aright, when the bill the execution of which we are now asked to suspend was pending before this body, it was stated by the honorable Senator from New York, not now with us, that he had examined the whole subject very carefully, and that the right we were about to recognize was, in his opinion, a very clear one. I think he stated that the claim had been more than once reported upon favorably by committees of each branch, and that bills had been reported in each branch confirming the title, and passed by each branch; but they had failed to become laws because of the want of time in the respective branches to concur with each other at the same session. From what the honorable member from New York stated, and from my recollection of the case in 15 Howard, I think the honorable member from Oregon and the committee in whose behalf he acts are laboring under a great misapprehension as to the decision of the Supreme Court to which he has referred. The case came before the Supreme Court under the act of 1834. The terms of that act referred exclusively to equitable titles, leaving legal titles to stand upon the general law.

The case with relation to this grant as it came to the Supreme Court, and as reported in 15 Howard, was held by the court, if I recollect aright, to be a legal and not an equitable title, and that being a legal and not an equitable title, the court had no jurisdiction over it. Mr. Justice Nelson gave the opinion of the court coming to that result; but he went on, extra-judicially, to express an opinion of his own in part upon the validity of the title itself irrespective of the inquiry whether it was an equitable or a legal title. I have not read his opinion lately; but I have a recollection that when I did read it he failed to satisfy me that he was right. But however that is, Mr. Justice Curtis, Mr. Justice McLean, Mr. Justice Campbell, and another judge, one I believe speaking for all the dissentients, stated that it was not to be understood that the Supreme Court had formed, or that it was right to express, any opinion upon the title; and from the manner in which that statement is made in the report upon the authority of the dissenting judges, I am strongly inclined to the opinion that in their view the title was a valid one, but not one to be passed upon by them for the reason I have stated, that their authority was only to examine into equitable and not legal titles.

Now, Mr. President, upon, not a hasty examination, as the chairman states, but upon the examination of a very eminent professional man, we passed almost unanimously, I believe, the law which we are now asked to suspend; and we are now, at the last days of the session, asked to suspend it upon the ground that we made a mistake. Who says we made a mistake? The House of Representatives, in passing that preamble, tells us that we have made a mistake, and we have stricken the preamble out. It seems to me to be rather reflecting upon the Senate, however the House would have been justified for itself, to tell us, as they virtually do by this preamble, that we did not know what we were about when we passed that bill. How do they propose to correct the assumed error? Not by providing that the law is not to be executed until Congress shall have an opportunity of repealing it, if they shall think it ought to be repealed, upon the ground that it never should have passed; but we are asked to suspend the provision of the act altogether until Congress shall declare that it be executed.

Now, what is the effect of that? The Senate may, upon examination, be satisfied that the title was a valid one; the House of Representatives may think differently; and although we may think it was a valid title, and consequently that the law which we are about to suspend ought not to be suspended, but ought to be executed, and upon thorough and mature examination come to that result, we are placed in a situation in which we shall be restrained from doing what is right unless the other branch concur with us in saying that the law ought to be executed.

I object, therefore, if anything be done suspending the operation of this law, to the manner in which we are now asked to do it. If the honorable member would amend the resolution so as to provide that the law shall not be executed until Congress shall have had an opportunity to repeal it at the next session, it would not be so obnoxious to objection; but to place our sense of justice in the keeping of the House of Representatives, and that, too, upon the faith, in part, of a preamble which is not true, in relation to the decision of the Supreme Court, seems to me to be entirely wrong.

Of the merits of the title, I repeat that I know nothing except as I collected them from the honorable member from New York, and from my recollection of what was said in relation to the title by Mr. Justice Nelson. I am willing to believe, and do believe, notwithstanding the opinion of Mr. Justice Nelson, that the title is a valid one; and I am more inclined to believe it, because, in addition to the statement of the honorable member from New York that it was valid, as I understand what fell from the judges who dissented from that part of the opinion of Mr. Justice Nelson, they were under the impression that it was a valid title.

If the honorable member from Oregon will adopt the suggestion I have made, that the law be suspended until the termination of the next session of Congress, so that Congress may have an opportunity to repeal it, I shall vote for it; and if he does not accept the suggestion to so modify it, I ask him to permit the bill to lie on the table until the morning, that I may propose an amendment to that effect, and that I may in the mean time examine the decision in 15 Howard, to which he adverted. There can be no harm in that, I am sure. I can assure the honorable member that I will examine it by to-morrow morning, and be ready either to abandon all objection to the form in which this resolution comes from the other branch, or to prepare an amendment to effect the object which I have just stated. I move, therefore, that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the honorable Senator from Maryland will not labor under any misapprehension as to the position of the present Committee on Private Land Claims; and I advise him that it is not because the Supreme Court has made any decision that they report in favor of the joint resolution now before the Senate; and I wish to satisfy the honorable Senator, as I can do in one minute, from the statement of the petitioners themselves, that the bill of the last session ought not to have passed, notwithstanding all that has heretofore been said and done in reference to the subject. I call the attention of the honorable Senator to this statement from the petition of these heirs; and of course they would not state the case against their own interest; they say in the document from which I have already read:

"We are thus brought to the important question. How much of the original of 1717 was left to Dauterive by O'Reilly and Unzaga? In 1772 Andry, the Governor's surveyor, was directed to survey Dauterive's land, Governor Unzaga having consented to leave him in possession of forty instead of twenty arpents front. Andry went on the land, examined the improvements, a road of four leagues in length, which had been made on the grant, and reported to the Governor that they had surveyed for Dauterive forty-four instead of forty arpents in a certain locality. All this was expressly approved by Governor Unzaga; in other words, as stated by the Supreme Court, Unzaga confirmed the original French grant pro tanto.

"Under these circumstances, we present ourselves with a claim for so much of a French concession of 1717 as was approved, and confirmed by the Spanish Government in 1772."

All that these petitioners claim is simply what was confirmed by Unzaga, which was forty arpents, forty acres broad on the Mississippi, extending back twelve miles to the Atchafalaya river, and yet the bill of the last session allows them the entire concession that was made by the Mississippi Company to Duvernay, extending twelve miles front on the Mississippi river and twelve miles back, giving to these people twenty times as much as they claimed in their own memorial, and all the way through it you will find by examining it that all the claim they make is simply a claim for their proportion of a tract of land in Louisiana forty acres broad on the Mississippi river, and extending back twelve miles, and these heirs of Bouigny are only entitled to one sixth part of that. Here is the great mistake that has been made.

In reference to the Supreme Court of the United States, I acknowledge that the case was dismissed for want of jurisdiction in that court or in the district court of the United States for Louisiana; but Mr. Justice Nelson in delivering the opinion of the court examines the Duvernay title and declares it entirely invalid on the ground that nobody knows where the location was made, and on the ground that it had no boundary and it had never been surveyed from the time the concession was made by the Mississippi company to Duvernay. The only survey ever made was of the grant that was given to the purchaser from Duvernay by Unzaga, the Spanish Governor; and it is upon that survey that these petitioners claim, and the whole of that tract, according to the boundaries of it as they set it forth in their petition, contains only a little over eight thousand acres of land, and there is no computation of figures that can make it contain more. Then while these claimants only claimed a grant of a little over eight thousand acres of land, the bill of last session goes upon the assumption that the claim is over four hundred and fifty-five thousand acres.

I am indifferent as to the particular form of the resolution, and am disposed in that respect to accommodate the honorable Senator from Maryland; but I think it is desirable that this matter should be disposed of at this session in some way, so that the parties may be relieved from their suspense about it.

Mr. JOINSON. My motive in asking the postponement was not to defeat the measure, but simply for the purpose of examining into the question which it involves, and particularly into the decision of the Supreme Court. I assure the honorable member that if he calls up the joint resolution to-morrow morning I shall interpose no obstacle to its then being acted upon finally. I therefore renew my motion to postpone until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to—ayes eighteen, noes not counted.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW TRUST FUNDS.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business which was laid aside at one o'clock. The Senator from Wisconsin desires to withdraw his amendment, and then I think we can pass the joint resolution without discussion.

Mr. MORTON. There was a resolution under consideration the day before yesterday which was left as the unfinished business for yesterday, but it was crowded out by other measures. It will take but a short time to dispose of it and I should be glad to have it taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No.

18) for the sale of certain stocks held in trust for the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to say that when I proposed the pending amendment my attention was not called to the fact that the claims for which awards have been made are against the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations separately, and from information that has come to me I ascertained that about two thirds of these awards are against the Chickasaw nation and one third against the Choctaw nation. The fund out of which I desired to pay the awards is a debt due by the United States to the Choctaw nation alone. I find, therefore, that my amendment is hardly applicable to the case, and I cannot do justice to the case by insisting upon it. I am therefore constrained to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection be made, leave will be granted to withdraw the amendment. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the joint resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I hope that will be taken as a test question.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope that will not be done. It has had the attention of the Committee on Indian Affairs already and has been reported unanimously from that committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. My purpose is to postpone action on this subject of the sale of the bonds, which is really a financial question, until after the awards shall have been made by the Secretary of the Interior. From the debate I am satisfied that this ought to be done. There is no necessity to authorize the sale of these bonds until after the amount of the debts has been ascertained. It may be that the Indians would prefer to pay the debts out of their other funds, or by that time they may have other means of paying them. At any rate there is no occasion for providing the means now.

Mr. POMEROY. This is only providing for the payment of the awards in case they are approved by the Secretary of the Interior. It does not require him to sell any bonds.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no necessity for changing the existing law or changing the treaty or making provision for the payment of the awards, until the awards are made and submitted to us. It seems to me that we ought not in advance to undertake to sell the trust funds of these Indians, a portion of which is devoted to the support of their schools, until the matter is ascertained and submitted to us upon the report of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator is not aware of the fact, and does not understand the fact, that these Indians are now in an entirely destitute condition. They were driven into my State, and they are to return to the Indian country in the spring. They have nothing to commence with when they go there, and can do nothing unless they have some compensation for the losses they sustained by being driven out. This is a method of providing that compensation.

Mr. SHERMAN. From what was stated yesterday by the Senator from Iowa, who was Secretary of the Interior at the time the treaty was made, I understood that the amount awarded in this case is far beyond what the tribe supposed it would be. I am told that it is eight or ten times as much as the Indians expected. They are disappointed with it, and they intend to contest it. Certainly we ought not against their wishes to sell their securities—for they are not ours—held by us in trust for them, until that question is settled. We ought not to provide for changing the treaty until after the amount is adjusted.

Mr. POMEROY. This does not provide for any change in the treaty.

Mr. SHERMAN. It provides for the sale of bonds in order to produce money.

Mr. POMEROY. It only provides for producing money to pay the awards provided for in the treaty, and the amount does not exceed the amount named in the treaty. If these Indians could be returned to their own country in any season of the year when they were in condition to support themselves, there would not be so much cruelty about it; but they must be returned this spring, and they have no funds and no means to do anything with. I hope this provision will be made. But I shall not discuss the question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should really like to understand what the true condition of this question is. It was mixed up yesterday with another question which had nothing to do with it apparently, and with which certainly I can see no connection. I understand that on one side it is claimed—and I should like to know where the truth lies—that the Chickasaws, for whose benefit this resolution is intended, were a portion of the tribe who for being loyal were driven out from the tribe, and after the rebellion was suppressed, a new treaty was made with the Chickasaw tribe proper, as well as with the Choctaws, made with that portion of the tribes who were rebels in point of fact; and in that treaty thus made with them, in which certain claims of theirs were recognized against the United States, provisions were inserted to the effect that they should pay to these people who had been driven out for their loyalty for certain property of theirs which they had taken and confiscated and put into the treasury of the nation. Those claims thus made have been submitted to a commission, and have been ascertained so far as the commission is concerned, and reported to the Secretary of the Interior, but have not yet been examined by him, owing to the want of time and their voluminous character; and it is not known what the decision will be. The provision of the treaty is that these claims, when ascertained, shall be paid out of moneys belonging to the Chickasaw nation in the possession of the United States. Now, there are no moneys, technically, belonging to them in the possession of the United States; but there is a certain trust fund belonging to them, consisting of bonds of the United States, to more than a sufficient amount to pay these claims. This resolution proposes, in case the claims are confirmed by the Secretary of the Interior, to sell a portion of the funds thus belonging to them for the purpose of paying the claims, there being nothing else out of which to pay them.

If that is the simple state of the fact, I am disposed to agree to the resolution, especially as it is alleged that these loyal Indians have been reduced from a state of affluence to poverty, absolute want, and suffering by the act of the rebel portion of the tribe, who are the majority, who drove them out; and that unless we make some provision for them in this way they must continue in a state of starvation.

Now, sir, on that statement, taking it to be true, I do not see any very particular objection to doing it. "Money" is a technical term, and the Secretary of the Interior, I think, understands that he has no authority to sell the trust funds, and he wants this resolution passed for the purpose of enabling him to raise money to pay these claims in case he affirms them. The Senator from Ohio objects, that these funds are set apart for schools, &c. I understand the fact to be that they are general funds for general uses, schools among other things; and that there are sufficient stocks which may be sold without material loss, being stocks of the United States, sufficient to pay these claims.

If that was all there was of the case, I should vote to give the authority asked, because in the first place it is perfectly manifest on that statement that the tribe whom we are trying to protect are those who were against us, who rebelled and drove out loyal Indians from among them, and who have been kept in a state of starvation ever since the tribe confiscated their property, and put it into their treasury. This is merely calling on them to pay back what has been decided to be justly due to those whom they drove out, and drove out in a state of starvation.

On the other hand, however, it is said that in point of fact this money is not going to these Indians, but is going into the hands of agents and speculators, who are merely pursuing their private claims and trying to have these funds sold for the sake of putting money into their own pockets. If that is the state of the fact I should like to know it, and I should like to know what the justice of their claims is. If that is the case, it calls for an explanation; and if it is not the case and the facts be substantially as I have stated them, there is no reason in the world why we should not give the authority to raise the money necessary to support these Indians and give them what is due to them out of any funds we have in our hands belonging to the rebel tribe.

Mr. POMEROY. As I understand the case, the Senator from Maine gave the exact version for it; but with regard to his last remark, in relation to agents, I will say that I never heard of any agents in connection with this claim. I never heard the objection that this money is not going to the Indians. So far as I know, and so far as I believe, it will all go to the Indians where it belongs. I know nothing to the contrary, and I never heard anything to the contrary.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator from Maine has stated the case clearly and exactly, I think, according to the facts as they exist, except that he has made one omission, and that is this: according to his information the case has not been examined. There were commissioners appointed by the President to go down among these people and examine the claim of each loyal person who had been driven out. That commission went to the vicinity of the location of these refugee Indians near Fort Smith and Fort Gibson, and there took testimony, as I understand, in the presence of attorneys for the tribes, some three attorneys appearing for one of the tribes, and five attorneys, I think, appearing for the other. After this testimony had been taken one of the commissioners went down into the lands owned by the tribes proper, consulted with the governor of each tribe, as they call the chiefs of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and the governor of the tribe introduced additional rebutting testimony, examining specifically every case, and where the governor had doubt of the validity of a claim, introducing rebutting testimony.

This much is due to the facts as to the investigations that have been had. These commissioners have reported the testimony, with their conclusions as to the amount due to each one of these loyal Indians, and that report is now before the Secretary of the Interior. As I understand, the Secretary has not reviewed the testimony, and has not ultimately awarded the amount found to be due by the commissioners. The Indians or attorneys for them, as I understand, have asked the Secretary of the Interior to review the whole case; and to enable him to do so the Committee on Indian Affairs have proposed an amendment to this joint resolution, which has been adopted and is now a part of the resolution, authorizing the Secretary to review the whole case, and if in his opinion it should be necessary, of course to send it back to the ground where the witnesses live in order that the whole case may thus be reviewed. But the only question for the Senate to decide, it seems to me, is whether the provision of the treaty shall be carried into effect as originally intended, and whether the disloyal portion of the Choctaws and Chickasaws shall pay the damages which they inflicted on the lands and stock of the loyal part of those tribes that were driven north. They have agreed to do it, and do not object to doing it to-day. They do not, as I understand, object to the conversion of these bonds; but they merely claim that the Secretary of the Interior must review the case, and ascertain whether the award made by the commissioners is too great or not. It is larger than they had expected; but this grows out of the fact that there were more Choctaws and Chickasaws driven north than they supposed. They being more in number, and having lost more property on account of their being more of them who were driven north than they had supposed, of course augments the amount.

I do not know whether any part of this money will go to anybody else than Indians or not. The rule of the Department has been, and I suppose is now, and will continue to be, not to pay one dollar of any such award to any other person than the Indian or individual himself. The money, I doubt not, will be hereafter, as it has been heretofore, paid to the Indian himself, who is the claimant; and if he chooses to pay a part of that money to an attorney for advice after he receives it, of course the Government cannot control it. That they have employed legal advisers I suppose is true; but if the Secretary of the Interior carries out what has been the rule of the Department heretofore, and I doubt not as now, he will pay the money to the Indians, and when once put into their hands they will of course do as other men do who collect claims.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want a little information from the honorable Senator in regard to the article of the treaty. If this money was intended for the relief from pressing distress of the loyal Indians who were driven out, and was to be used in that way, I could not resist the application, because the treaty provides for the payment of these claims; but this money is due in the nature of damages to particular Indians. It does not go to the Indian tribe, or even to the loyal Indians, but goes to particular Indians whose property was destroyed or injured, and also goes to other persons named, Heald & Wright, traders, whose property it is alleged was destroyed. It is not probable that the money paid under this arrangement will go for the relief of the Indians; but very likely the claims have been assigned, and are now in the hands of assignees.

Mr. HARLAN. I can only say as to that that the Department has always heretofore refused to recognize any agent or attorney in transactions of this kind.

Mr. SHERMAN. In cases of assignment?

Mr. HARLAN. Such claims cannot be assigned properly under the laws of the United States. I think there is a law prohibiting the payment of money due to Indians to any attorney. It can only be paid either to the Indian himself directly, or through the agent appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who gives bond for the faithful performance of this duty, with securities, as any other disbursing officer of the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. The treaty is so worded that it does not confine the payment to Indians. It authorizes the payment of these claims, and authorizes their payment from any moneys of the nation in the hands of the United States, as the commission may award. It does not confine the payment to Indians; and there is nothing in the public laws that I know of to prevent any Indian assigning his claim. Then a large portion of the money is to go to Joseph E. Heald and Reuben Wright, who stand in the position of other claim agents.

Mr. HARLAN. I know nothing of the holders of the claims of these traders; but I think there is no controversy over that matter. When that treaty was made the delegates of these Indian tribes were perfectly willing to pay these traders, as they said, for provisions which were in the Territory when the war began, and which the authorities of these tribes seized and used. The traders were unable to go North; and although they had no legal claim, the Indians were perfectly willing to pay them a certain amount, and there was no controversy over it, except that a maximum was fixed beyond which payment should not be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The question being put, the motion was declared to be not agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit, and I hope the motion will be agreed to. I have heard a great deal that has been said on the subject. When it was first discussed yesterday I was disposed to vote with the honorable Senator who has charge of the resolution [Mr. POMEROY] and with my friend who sits behind me, [Mr. HARLAN;] but I am entirely satisfied now that it is one of those cases which ought to be very thoroughly examined before we take any further step in the matter. So far as the loyal Indians, who are proposed to be the beneficiaries, are concerned, I should be willing to make any appropriation for their benefit; but there is more than that contained in this proposition, as I believe. I believe the Indians are not all the parties to be benefited by the passage of this resolution and by the additional indorsement of this claim. I am convinced that it ought to have a thorough investigation before we give it further indorsement, and I hope that will be done.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator may not be aware that it has been before the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CONNESS. I am quite aware of it, and I have great confidence in that committee; otherwise I would not propose to refer it again.

Mr. POMEROY. They reported this resolution only three days ago unanimously.

Mr. CONNESS. I am aware of that; but they did not go down to the marrow of this case in their recent investigation of the subject. This claim has grown, or that upon which it was founded, until it has become a mammoth one.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator may not be aware that the Senator from Wisconsin has withdrawn the amendment which refers to that question, and this resolution has nothing to do with the old claim.

Mr. CONNESS. It is unpleasant to me to support this motion, because I have no want of confidence in the honorable Senators who are advocating this measure; but I think safety requires that we should recommit it for investigation. I think it is being urged by persons who are more deeply interested in it than Indians.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to ask the Senator from California what precise point he desires to have examined by the committee? Is it to be recommitted for any special purpose?

Mr. CONNESS. I desire the merits of the entire question to be examined before any further indorsements of it be had by action here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the Senator misapprehends; probably he did not hear the remarks I made this morning. This has no sort of connection with that old claim to which he refers. It arises under a different treaty. All the discussion of yesterday upon that old claim was entirely out of place, and had no sort of connection with this question.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was then pending.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It came up then on an amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, which has now been withdrawn.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It has nothing to do with the question as it is now presented.

Mr. CONNESS. Well, Mr. President, upon a subject that I am not exactly informed upon, and which Senators like those who rise before me profess to be exactly informed upon, it is very difficult for me to persist; and I withdraw my persistence in this case. I have great confidence in those Senators; but it would give me much more pleasure and satisfaction as a Senator here to see an investigation made before this measure is passed. Nevertheless, my defense is due to those Senators to this extent, and I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to recommit has been decided in the negative.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend the joint resolution by adding as a new section:

And be it further resolved, That if the Secretary of the Interior shall not approve or confirm the awards already made, the President shall, on being notified thereof, appoint other commissioners, who shall take testimony and report as provided by the terms of said treaty; and the President may fix the times and places for the meeting of said commissioners for taking testimony on the claims presented. And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby required to pay the amount of award due to each Indian in person; and no part thereof shall be paid to any assignee, agent, or attorney.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL MACHINERY.

Mr. MORGAN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 31) to remit or refund duties on agricultural machinery imported into the United States as models, have instructed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. If it is to be passed at all, it should be passed promptly. I therefore ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. The tariff act of 1864 exempted this machinery from taxation, and the tariff act of 1865 extended the exemption for one year, and it expired on the 3d of March, 1866. The principle has been established by Congress. Not only this, but it was on the free list in the tariff bill pending at the last session.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have no objection to the passage of this resolution; but I suggest to the Senator from New York whether if we are to be called upon to act on the tariff again it is not advisable to take the House bill in relation to articles of statuary, works of art, that have been given to various municipalities, and whether that should not be incorporated in the same bill with this. It is better to have as few of these bills as possible; and if we are going to be called on to act upon the subject to which I have referred, I suggest the propriety of considering both together.

Mr. MORGAN. If there be no objection from other quarters to that course, I shall make none.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This had better go over till to-morrow.

Mr. MORGAN. Very well. I move to postpone the joint resolution until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT FOR SLAVES ENTERING THE ARMY.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House joint resolution No. 15.

Mr. MORTON. There is unfinished business of the day before yesterday which was crowded out yesterday by other matters. I desire to take it up now and have it disposed of. It will take but a short time to dispose of it, and I think it is entitled to precedence. The business to which I refer is joint resolution No. 32, providing for reimbursing the State of Indiana moneys expended during the rebellion. Since the question was before the Senate the other day I have learned that resolutions of the same character have been passed in regard to Missouri, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia. I have seen the act in regard to West Virginia making provision for allowing expenses of precisely the same character. I am told that Missouri and Pennsylvania have been paid expenses of the same kind. There are but two States that have any claims of that kind, as I am advised, Indiana and Ohio. The claim of Ohio, I think, is quite small. Special acts have been passed in regard to each other State—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I submit to the Senator from Indiana that my motion is in order, and I hope he will allow the joint resolution to which I have referred to come up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Illinois is in order, and being first made must be first put.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 15) suspending all proceedings in relation to payment for slaves drafted or received as volunteers in the military service of the United States, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It suspends all further proceedings under the twenty-fourth section of the act of Congress, approved February 24, 1864, "to award compensation to the masters of slaves drafted into the military service of the United States, and award compensation to persons to whom colored volunteers may owe service;" and under the second section of the act approved July 28, 1866, "making appropriation for payment to persons claiming service or labor from colored volunteers or drafted men." The Secretary of War is to dissolve the commissions appointed under these sections, and make payment to the commissioners and clerks for the services rendered, upon their making report of their proceedings to the War Department.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am sorry that the honorable Senator from Illinois presses this measure with so much pertinacity. I had hoped that his own consideration of justice and of the plighted faith of the Government in relation to this subject would have induced him to consent that the measure should be silently dropped. It is simply an effort to induce Congress to take up the matter of repudiation. That position cannot be doubted by any gentleman who will understand the facts of the case. On the 24th of February, 1864, Congress passed an act containing this section:

"Sec. 24. And be it further enacted, That all able-bodied male colored persons, between the ages of twenty and forty-five years, resident in the United States, shall be enrolled according to the provisions of this act, and of the act to which this is an amendment, and form part of the national forces; and when a slave of a loyal master shall be drafted and mustered into the service of the United States his master shall have a certificate thereof, and thereupon such slave shall be free; and the bounty of $100 now payable by law for each drafted man shall be paid to the person to whom such drafted person was owing service or labor at the time of his muster into the service of the United States. The Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress, charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation, not exceeding $300 for each such colored volunteer, payable out of the fund derived from commutations, and every such colored volunteer, on being mustered into the service, shall be free."

The Senate will recollect that persons who were liable to be drafted into the military service were allowed to commute that obligation by the payment of $300 each. The aggregate amount thus paid by way of commutation was some ten or twelve million dollars. In the act which I have read this fund is set apart by the law of Congress to pay to the loyal owners of slaves that should be enlisted into the military service, or who might volunteer, $300 each; and to the owners of those who might be drafted, $100 each. Here is the simple law, the obligation and contract of Congress and of the United States in the form of a law, that all loyal owners of slaves who would encourage them to enlist into the military service of the United States should receive $300 for each one voluntarily enlisted, and $100 for each slave who might be drafted. Under the faith plighted by this law many of the loyal owners of slaves in Kentucky and in Maryland induced them to enlist into the military service; and many enlisted into the military service without consulting with their owners at all. When this law, in its plain, explicit terms, says that here is a fund arising from commutation, which, by the report of the War Office, amounts to ten or twelve million dollars, that shall be appropriated to the payment of bounties for every loyal man's slave that may be enlisted into the service of the United States, not exceeding $300 each, I ask if there can be a plainer pledge, a plainer contract on the part of the Government with the owners of this sort of property, that they should have in the form of bounty from that fund not exceeding the sum of $300 for each enlisted slave?

What is the proposition now under consideration? It is simply in substance and effect to repudiate this contract. The law from which I have read was passed in 1864. At the first session of the last Congress, the House of Representatives inserted in one of the appropriation bills a clause repealing this law; and the appropriation bill in that shape came to the Senate. The Committee on Finance recommended a disagreement to the House provision repealing the law. The subject was discussed in the Senate, and after consideration the Senate acted in conformity with the recommendation of its committee and disagreed to the clause of the House bill repealing the law which I have just read. This action of the Senate was submitted to the House and the House concurred in this adherence of the Senate to the good faith of Congress, thus refusing to repudiate the solemn obligation of the Government, and reaffirming it.

Here was this matter then again deliberately acted upon: The House of Representatives endeavored to lure the Senate to a violation of the faith of the Government and of Congress. The Senate refused to be so lured and decided, and so did Congress, solemnly, after argument and after conference between the two Houses on the disagreeing votes, that the faith of the Government should be preserved and that this $300 bounty should be paid. That was a sacred form, and a more solemn form in which Congress decided to preserve its faith with the owners of this property. The Secretary of War, though, from time to time refused to appoint commissions to assess the value of these slaves, not exceeding $300 each, until 1866, when in one of the appropriation bills this clause was inserted:

"That so much of any money in the Treasury known as the 'commutation fund'—" the fund that was set apart and was pledged by the act of 1864, for the payment of these bounties—

"as may be necessary be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the payment to loyal persons claiming service or labor from colored volunteers or drafted men, the amounts heretofore or hereafter to be awarded them under the provisions of section twenty-four of the act entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces,' approved February 24, 1864,' which I have just read—

"for each person so claimed to be held to service or labor, who has enlisted or been drafted into the military service of the United States."

Now, Mr. President, here is the faith of the Senate three times solemnly pledged to the payment of these bounties. I ask, then, if the Senate should not in good faith pay these bounties to the loyal owners of the slaves who were thus enlisted. I remember that a day or two ago the present incumbent of the chair [Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN] enunciated this beautiful sentiment: that the plighted faith of a nation was its religion, and that that plighted faith ought to be observed with all the solemnities of the most religious obligation. It was a just and a beautiful sentiment, and uttered in handsome, classic language. I think that that sentiment of national morals, of good faith between the Government and its citizens, ought to find an echo in the bosom of every American statesman and of every honest man. I am amazed at the persistence of the House of Representatives, and especially at the persistence of the honorable Senator from Illinois, in endeavoring to coerce the Senate into this flagitious violation of its faith and of the faith of the Government. Why, sir, if a private individual was to make the same efforts to evade the payment of his debts he would render himself infamous; he would bring down upon himself the dishonor of his neighbors and of the community in which he lived; and he would no longer receive credit or trust or respect in that community. Sir, the faith of the Government of the nation ought to be held more sacred if possible than that of an individual. The highest obligation that I can conceive of is the obligation of a Government to its loyal people. I can conceive of no covenant, no obligation that should be held more sacred than that of a Government to its people.

Mr. President, it need not be said that the consideration of this law and of this promise of the Government was man, and that man cannot be property. There is hardly a civilized nation on earth, certainly none of the States of the United States of America; that has not recognized the existence of property in African slaves. I have before me the celebrated case of Somerset, decided by Lord Mansfield in 1772. In that decision Lord Mansfield recites again and again that a century before Sir Philip Yorke, then attorney general, and Lord Talbot, solicitor general, two of the ablest men, he said, of that or of any age, had held that slavery existed in England. In this very case of Somerset he decides explicitly, in the plainest terms, that slavery then existed in England; that there were seventeen thousand slaves at that time in Great Britain, worth seventy-five pounds each; and he says, in the plainest language, that if Somerset had been sold as a slave the obligation to pay the money would have been sustained as a legal obligation, and judgment would have been rendered upon it in his own court. I will read a short paragraph from that decision:

"The question is, if the owner had a right to detain the slave for the sending of him over to be sold in Jamaica."

I will state the facts in the case. Somerset was a slave born in the colony of Virginia. From Virginia he was taken to Jamaica or one of the West India Islands, and from that island he was taken by his owner to England. The owner afterward determined to take Somerset back to Jamaica as a slave, and some persons interfering with him in his purpose in England he placed Somerset on board of a ship in the Thames. A friend of Somerset sued out a writ of habeas corpus directed to the captain of the ship to show cause before Lord Mansfield in the Court of King's Bench why he detained Somerset. The captain, Captain Knowles, reported these facts to Lord Mansfield, and Lord Mansfield decided expressly that slavery existed in England; that Somerset was a slave; that if Somerset had been sold and a bond executed for the consideration money the laws of England would have held that a valid contract upon a valid consideration, and that his own court would have sustained the obligation and have rendered judgment upon it. What principle then did he decide? He decided simply this: that there were laws in operation in England at that time that would prevent the owner of Somerset from taking him from that island to one of the colonial possessions of Great Britain as a slave, and therefore he granted the writ of habeas corpus. Here is what Lord Mansfield says:

"The question is, if the owner had a right to detain the slave for the sending of him over to be sold in Jamaica. In five or six cases of this nature I have known it to be accommodated by agreement between the parties. On its first coming before me I strongly recommended it here; but if the parties will have it decided, we must give our opinion. Compassion will not, on the one hand, nor inconvenience on the other, be to decide; but the law: in which the difficulty will be principally from the inconvenience on both sides. Contract for sale of a slave is good here: the sale is a matter to which the law properly and readily attaches, and will maintain the price according to the agreement."—Lois's Reports, page 17.

We have heard a great deal of misrepresentation about this celebrated case of Somerset, and, in the language of Curran, that Lord Mansfield decided that slavery could not exist in England; that the moment a slave touched that soil he stood redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled by the irresistible genius of universal emancipation. Sir, that was only a grand rhetorical flourish; there was no truth in it. There were in England at that time seventeen thousand slaves. I have traced the history of the subject of slavery in England, and it had existed there for more than a hundred years. Slaves had been bought and sold there. They had been distributed as assets among the distributees of a decedent who owned them. The slave trade had been recognized in various forms. But I am not going into that subject. I read this decision merely to show that if Somerset had been sold on a credit by his owner to a subject of Great Britain in the island of England, and if when the note for the consideration money fell due it had not been paid, and a suit had been instituted in the court of King's Bench where Lord Mansfield was the presiding judge, he himself solemnly said the law would attach an obligation to him and would require the money to be paid by judgment; and there were many cases of that kind.

I have here various opinions given in this country. I am not going to read them. I will merely refer to them. I have the decision in the case of Prigg vs. Pennsylvania. I have the decision of the case arising in the State of Ohio. I have other decisions, all recognizing the fact that property exists in slaves in any State that chose to establish the institution. There never was a court of the United States or of a State that decided the contrary until this war commenced. You may take the decisions of all the circuit courts, and especially the circuit courts in the western States, where questions connected with slavery were of frequent occurrence; you may take the decisions of all the State courts from Wisconsin to Massachusetts, including the judgment of Judge Shaw, and the unanimous decision of the superior court of Massachusetts; and they all recognize the existence of property in slaves in the States that chose to establish the institution. I will not read any of these cases. But, sir, all the courts of the United States that have passed upon the subject recognize property in slaves just as in any other subject of property, so far as it concerns the States or the countries which have established that institution. That the honorable Senator will not deny.

Now, Mr. President, when the Government chooses by its own law to enter up its solemn promise that where slaves are enlisted it will pay, if the enlistment is voluntary, to the loyal owner $300, and where the Senate and Congress in two or three forms affirmed that proposition, I ask if the Senate ought to consider now this subject of a repudiation of such an obligation.

I might as well state my own experience in relation to slavery in a few simple words. At the beginning of the war I owned eighteen slaves, or rather I was owned by eighteen slaves, [laughter.] for I had to do a great deal more work than any of them did. I had two men that enlisted; and I will state the circumstances under which I became their owner. I owned the wife of one and his children. His wife and he importuned me to purchase him. I did buy him for the sum of $1,000; and in a year or two he went free because he enlisted into the Army and became a soldier. He never reimbursed me for the amount of money which I paid for him.

I had another man who enlisted in the Army. I bought him when he was some six or seven years of age, and I made a house boy of him. Like all house boys, he did not do much work. Well, sir, after awhile the war commenced; the drum beat; and it summoned recruits, and negro recruits. This young fellow, that I had given $600 for when he was six or seven years old, took it into his head that he would turn soldier; and he did turn soldier. Now, I ask you, sir, if I have not a claim upon my country for the bounty which it promised me?

But that is not all. I have not got done with my experience in relation to slaves yet. This boy had a mother, and he induced his mother to desire to have the same home. Upon his importunity and her importunity I purchased her; and I gave $900 for her. Well, she was a young woman and was having children, and she had four or five children, during which time anybody who knows anything of raising negroes and family negroes will know she was not of much value to me. She had a free husband, who lived pretty much upon me. [Laughter.] He used to come there every night, burn my fuel all night, and eat my bacon, corn, and potatoes. [Laughter.] After awhile he took it into his head that he would become a soldier, too. He did so. She had four likely young children. She had never rendered me as much service as would pay her expenses; but under the bill of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson,] freeing the wives and children of soldiers who went into the Army, her husband came and claimed that she and all her children were free; and away they went. [Laughter.]

Then this man that I bought for $1,000 had a wife. I raised her. Some I bought; some I raised; some I inherited. His wife was a very valuable woman; exceedingly so. She was of value beyond money. I have seen the day when I could have got $2,000 for her. I never doubted after the war commenced that emancipation of the slaves would ensue. I told my neighbors and friends it would be so. I saw that it would come. I told some Union men who were very much attached to slavery, "If this war is made instead of securing slavery it will result speedily in its overthrow, and the northern men will soon arm your own slaves and turn them in hostile array against you, your wives, and your children." I never doubted it. I could have sold my slaves then for large sums of money; but my slaves were not for sale. They were my family. I had raised them. Next to my wife and children they were the dearest in the world to me; and I would have protected them, and have protected them, next to my wife and children. I knew that emancipation would come. If I had been operated upon by the mere matter of lucre, I would then have sold these slaves; but there were no considerations connected with earth or with life that would have induced me to sell them.

But, sir, I am still not done with my experience in relation to slavery. There was an old family servant by the name of John. He is about five years older than I am. He is now—

Mr. JOHNSON. How old are you?

Mr. DAVIS. Well, he is seventy years old. He is not so old as the honorable Senator from Maryland by about from five to ten years. [Laughter.] I had old John ever since my memory. He was a mill boy; he was an errand boy. I had my origin in the primeval days of Kentucky, and our mothers and our housewives used to have a good deal of spinning done, and they had looms in their own families, or some neighbor's daughter was a good weaver, and they would send the warp to the weavers and bring the wool home; and John was the boy that always went to the mill. John always took me with him then. I rode behind him. If a big boy wanted to impose on me, John would defend me; and if a big negro boy wanted to impose on him, I would fight and cry a great deal for John; and in that way we got along. In the course of nature John went off to a brother of mine; he sold him. A few years ago, John was old, and he came to me and said he wanted to get back into the family. He had a wife, almost blind, one of the greatest termagants I ever saw, [laughter,] and he and his wife solicited me to buy him; he said he wanted to get back into the family. "Well," said I, "John, if you were a strange negro I would not have you and your wife for $500; but as you will insist upon it I will buy you." I did so. I bought him and his wife. They lived with me contentedly, having little or nothing to do, and a house to themselves, and a patch of garden, and all that sort of thing, until this "cruel war," as I believe General Sherman called it in a letter that he wrote to an Episcopalian clergyman, came on, and John took it into his head that he must be free. "Well," said I, "John you are not able to support yourself now, and if you go off free you will be in a state of want; if you are tired of living with me, just find a man who will agree to support you when you are not able to support yourself, and if he will bind himself to support you and your wife, I will give him $400—$200 apiece." That did not suit John; he wanted to be free; so he went off into freedom. Well, sir, my wife writes me that after about six months, John has come back and is now on my premises. I told him, "Whenever you are not able to support yourself come back and you shall have a home and plenty as long as I can give it to you."

But, sir, I owned another very valuable young slave. A brother-in-law of mine and myself established a cotton farm; but I got tired of the business and sold out to him. This boy came back to my premises some time last summer. He was a very valuable boy, then in fine health, honest, industrious, and truthful. I was supporting him and giving him $150 a year; but in December last he was attacked with inflammatory rheumatism, and has not been able to do a hand's turn since, and I have been supporting him all the time since, and may have to do so. If he should continue in that helpless condition I will do so. John and I are wedded together as long as we both live; there is no doubt about that; and so is this boy, too, as long as he is unable to support himself. No human being that ever was a member of my family shall want while I have the means of supplying his wants.

Mr. President, I have given this narrative just for this simple purpose: it is something like an exhibit of slavery generally as it existed in the State of Kentucky, and of the present negro population of that State in their relationship and their dependence upon their former owners generally. It seems to me that if there are entanglements, the relations, the ties, the obligations that subsist between the late owners and their property, when the nation, in its legislation, by its solemn laws, has pledged itself that where the young and the best slaves were taken into the Army their owners should be compensated to a certain extent, and afterward the wives and children of those who did go into the Army were liberated—under such circumstances if Congress, even by improvident legislation, promised and pledged itself to pay $100 bounty in case of draft and $300 bounty in case of voluntary enlistment, the good faith, the humanity, and the self-respect of Congress, of the Senate at least, and every member of it, ought to induce them to let the matter rest.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I never hear the honorable Senator from Kentucky address the Senate that I do not listen with the most profound attention. When questions of constitutional law are to be discussed in this body, and I wish to be enlightened upon those questions, I turn involuntarily to the able Senator from Kentucky. I have received many lessons from him. There may be other members of this body to whom, on those questions that arise in courts of justice, and the practical questions that arise in discussions of such matters, I listen with as much respect as I do to the honorable Senator from Kentucky; but, sir, having sat in this body for eight years, there is no man for whose opinions and whose judgment I have such a profound respect as I have for the opinions of the honorable Senator from Kentucky when he rises to discuss a question of constitutional law or those great principles that underlie our Government.

I have listened to him to-day, sir. I have heard him tell some of his own experience in reference to slavery. I have heard from him nothing that has not been my own. I, too, am a sufferer pecuniarily from the legislation of Congress on this subject. But, sir, when that legislation was instituted I protested against it as a usurpation of power. I said the Congress of the United States had no right to take my private property and appropriate it for their uses without giving me just compensation. My voice in that debate was inefficient, unheard. Congress did it. To-day I am called upon to vote on the question whether the Treasury of the United States shall supply my losses or whether I shall bear them as an individual. I rise in my place here to say I will bear them as an individual; I will never vote a dollar of the public Treasury to pay me for an individual loss.

I know, sir, the argument that may be produced: "You had no right to do it, and therefore you are bound to pay for it;" but in the inception of your legislation I protested against it.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the honorable Senator one question. Do you believe that negroes were property?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do.

Mr. DAVIS. Is there not a plain constitutional provision that requires the Government to make just compensation for private property taken for public use?

Mr. SAULSBURY. There is.

Mr. DAVIS. Were not the negroes that enlisted into the Army taken for public use?

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir. There is the point upon which the honorable Senator and I differ. I will vote no dollar to pay out of the public Treasury to anybody, whether he is a Senator or a member of Congress or anybody else, for doing an act that I think was wrongful and disgraceful, if the Senator will pardon the word, a wrong done to me personally. When my negroes were taken, what few I had, it was not put upon the ground that they were taken as private property for public uses. It was done from political considerations that I thought were insufficient. I did not believe the doctrine then. I said they were not justified in taking my negroes, what few I had, and I had but very few. They did not put it upon the ground that they took them as private property for public uses; but they went on the grand humanitarian ground. They were going to elevate a degraded race and make the negro equal to the white man. I then uttered my feeble voice against it as an outrage upon my constitutional rights. Having taken that position, I shall never vote one single dollar to reimburse myself or anybody else situated as I am.

Mr. President, history will open up before the gaze of the American people a bright record. They will look upon it and they will see it. It is beginning to be opened now. When a proposition is made in the American Senate to pay southern slaveholders the value of slaves, which I then protested were wrongfully taken from them, we must examine the consistency of our record. This bill, if it is passed, to pay southern slaveholders, will benefit me some little; but thank God I can afford to dispense with your munificence, and if it is passed I certainly shall never take a dollar of it. But, sir, let me tell you, while that was my feeble utterance then, what is my utterance now. I hope there is no slaveholder in the United States who would accept the bounty extended by this bill. Let it go. It has passed. It is in the past. We can look upon it as one of those incidents of life which may happen at great revolutionary moments; but the sober second thought of the people perhaps will reconsider the judgment. I appeal to the Senator from Kentucky, and I appeal to every man situated as he is—

Mr. CONNESS. Will the honorable Senator give way for a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall be through in a moment. I hope that now that the clangor of arms is hushed, that in the whole length and breadth of this land there will not be one slaveholder who will come to your Treasury asking for relief. Let no such demand be made. I hope that no voice will come up from the men who were born in the midst of that institution, and I from my earliest recollections was surrounded with negro quarters, asking for compensation. You say you have restored the Union; so be it. Then we can all unite and thank God in one common voice; but we do not come knocking at your Treasury for a dollar. So far as I, as one individual, am concerned, whatever may be the fate of the proposition, no dollar from your Treasury shall be put into my pocket. I hope our southern friends will allow this bill to pass without making any demand. Let us show, as southern men, who have been injured by your legislation, that we will not ask it from you. In the future, sir, all we ask of you is, do justice, love mercy, and walk humbly before your God.

Mr. CATTELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we shall have a vote. I think we can take a vote without any further discussion.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we shall vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey withdraw his motion?

Mr. CATTELL. Yes, sir.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear the resolution read at length.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It reads "that all further proceedings be, and the same is hereby, suspended." It should be "are suspended."

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a House resolution. It reads "be, and the same is hereby, suspended."

Mr. FESSENDEN. "All further proceedings is."

Mr. TRUMBULL. Perhaps the grammar is not very accurate. It was an error probably in the enrolling.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not rise to debate the resolution. I wish merely to say that in my opinion it violates the plighted faith of the nation, and I am so strongly impressed with that conviction that I ask that the vote be taken by yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the passage of the resolution the Senator from Maryland asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and concluded the call.

Mr. CORBETT. I do not know that I understand this resolution thoroughly. I understand that it merely suspends the action of commissioners who are at work that is not necessary, a law having gone into effect cutting off these claims. Therefore, if I understand aright, I shall vote "yea."

Mr. WILSON. If the Senate will allow me to make one word of explanation, I should like to vote on this resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot be done unless by unanimous consent. "Yea" or "nay" is the word.

Mr. CONNESS, (to Mr. WILSON.) You can make your explanation on some other bill.

Mr. WILSON. Then I cannot vote on the resolution.

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Fowler, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, and Yates—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Johnson, Patterson of Tennessee, Van Winkle, and Wilkey—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Dixon, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howard, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, and Wilson—11.

So the joint resolution was passed.

PORT OF DELIVERY AT CHESTER.

Mr. CAMERON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 96) to establish a port of delivery at Chester, Pennsylvania; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope the Senate will give me a minute or two to pass this bill. It is a mere matter of form relating entirely to my own State and extending the boundaries of the collection district of Philadelphia. The bill is necessary, and will be of great advantage to the immediate neighborhood. I have shown it to all the members of the Committee on Commerce and they agree to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill at this time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does it come from a committee?

Mr. CAMERON. It is agreed to by the committee and approved by the Treasury Department.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It ought to come from a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, which provides that Chester, in the district of Philadelphia, shall be a port of delivery, and that a surveyor shall be appointed, who is to reside there, and receive a salary of $500 per annum.

Mr. CAMERON. Chester is within two miles of the present limits of the district. A large manufacturing business is growing up there and a large trade. It is desirable that vessels should be permitted to unload their cargoes at Chester instead of carrying them fifteen miles up the river and then bringing them down in lighters. It will be an advantage to the Government, and a great convenience to the people of the neighborhood. I hope the Senate will indulge me by passing it now, so that I may get it through the other House at the present session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no sort of objection to the bill; but I think it is the first instance since my service in the Senate that I have known a bill introduced and passed without any reference to a committee, unless it was to correct a mistake or something of that sort. I suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania to let it go to the Committee on Commerce, and it can be reported back in the morning and passed, merely to preserve the proper mode of doing business in the Senate. It cannot go to the House to-day, for the House has adjourned. I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope it will pass now, because we shall gain a day by it. I will say in addition that my State has asked nothing this year, I believe. I do not make many motions here, and do not disturb other gentlemen, and I trust they will indulge me in passing this bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It ought to be referred. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope it will not be referred. It has been shown to all the members of the committee and approved by every one of them. There can be no objection to it.

The motion to refer was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

EXTRA COMPENSATION TO CIVIL EMPLOYEES.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 29) to extend to the employés of the quartermaster's and subsistence departments at Washington the provisions of the joint resolution giving additional compensation to certain employés in the civil service of the Government at Washington was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that that resolution be indefinitely postponed. The subject was considered by the committee this morning, and I stated to the Senate reasons for our action.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of appropriations necessary to fulfill the stipulations of the treaty with the Chippewas of the Mississippi, concluded on the 19th of March, 1867; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 18th instant, information as to the number of persons employed under the acts for the collection of the direct tax in the insurrectionary districts within the United States, and the amount of salaries paid; which, on motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasurer of the United States, transmitting an account of receipts and expenditures for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in further answer to the resolution of the Senate of March 8, respecting armed expeditions against the Western Indians, a report of Lieutenant General Sherman; which, on motion of Mr. WILSON, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of March 12, a report from the Quartermaster General respecting the organization and equipment of the Government fire department of the city of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 15th instant, reports from the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the disposition made of that portion of fees received by consular agents within the districts of salaried consuls, that have been by such consular agents paid over to such consuls under the apportionment of fees of such agents by the President.

Mr. WILSON. I move that those papers lie on the table, and that the written matter, the manuscript, be printed. There is a large amount of printed matter there that it is not necessary to print.

The motion was agreed to.

RICHARD CHENERY.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 40) to provide for the payment of a certain claim; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the resolution be read at length for information.

The Secretary read the resolution, which appropriates such an amount of money as shall be found to be due Richard Chenery under a recent act of Congress for his relief, for the purpose of paying the same.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the Senate to consider the resolution at the present time. It is to correct an error in an act recently passed, which the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs will explain in a word. I hold in my hand the act which provides for the examination of this account; but it did not make an appropriation for the amount found due.

Mr. HENDERSON. You should amend the resolution so as to refer distinctly to that act.

Mr. CONNESS. It says "the recent act passed for his relief."

Mr. HENDERSON. You should name the act and the date of its passage.

Mr. CONNESS. It refers sufficiently to the act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks for the present consideration of the joint resolution. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. I submit to my friend from California that the language is rather awkward, as he will see on its reading.

Mr. HENDERSON. The resolution should refer to the date and the title of the act, so that there can be no mistake on the part of the Secretary.

Mr. CONNESS. I think all these objections are really technical. There has been no act passed for the relief of this man but the one I hold in my hand, and the resolution refers to that act. It cannot refer to anything else. If, however, there be a real objection to it, I will allow it to lie on the table until the morning; but I do not think it necessary at all. I ask the Senate to remember that we have at present no member from California in the other body; and I do not wish to delay the resolution at this hour longer than we can avoid. If any Senator will suggest an amendment, of course I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let it refer especially to the act.

Mr. CONNESS. I will amend it so as to refer to the act for the relief of Richard Chenery.

Mr. HENDERSON. The object of it is right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It should be limited to the $8,000 named in the other act, and not left to a general appropriation.

Mr. HENDERSON. The bill that passed did not require the Secretary to pay $8,000. I will state that it was an act passed at the late session. I drew the bill myself. It was a bill of one section, and I omitted the appropriation clause. The object of this bill, as I presume, is to appropriate a sufficient amount of money to pay it. That is all there is in it.

Mr. CONNESS. I accept the amendments proposed.

Mr. HARLAN. I am not willing to vote in favor of this bill to amend another law unless I can be informed of the substance of the law to be amended.

Mr. CONNESS. I will read the substance of the law to be amended:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to examine the claim of Richard Chenery, of California, for $8,000 alleged to be due to him for beef furnished to George P. Armstrong, temporary Indian agent for the tribes of Indians on the Russian river and at Clear Lake, and for which said Armstrong executed receipts dated March 23 and May 23, 1852; and if he shall believe from such examination that the property was furnished in good faith, and that the Government is justly indebted to the claimant as alleged, he shall cause the amount so found due to be paid: Provided, That in no event shall any greater sum than $8,000 be paid therefor.

That is the act we passed; and now this is to provide an appropriation for the payment of such an amount as shall be found to be due, which was omitted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "money" the words "not exceeding $8,000."

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to the amendment. The amount will be less than that in all probability.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HARLAN. I think this is one of a class of old claims which were of a very loose character. I think they were all examined in the Interior Department, and that part of them which was found to be just by the then Commissioner of Indian Affairs was long since paid. I apprehend that this is the remnant of a claim the justice of which is very doubtful. I think it had better go over.

Mr. CONNESS. This does not provide for paying the claim; it proposes an appropriation out of which the claim shall be paid if found to be due. The claim was examined fully by the Committee on Indian Affairs on its merits, and the bill providing for it passed by both Houses of Congress. This is to supply a provision that was left out of that bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not willing to let the statement of the Senator from Iowa stand as it is made. It rather leaves the impression that this claim has once been examined by the Secretary of the Interior and rejected. I will state to the Senator that I can find no evidence of that fact in the Department. I find a rejection of the claim simply because the Department had no money with which to pay it. There were some claims originating at the same time that were examined. The claim of Mr. McKee was examined, and a portion of it allowed and a portion rejected. The Senator may perhaps have an impression of this claim as connected with those old claims that originated in California. I believe there was nothing anywhere to be found in the Department going to show that this claim was not a correct and proper claim. The House of Representatives passed a bill allowing the claim positively and directing its payment. I was utterly unwilling to declare for the payment of the claim, but made it obligatory upon the Secretary of the Interior to examine it, leaving it entirely with him to say whether it should be paid or not, and that he should not pay more than the principal of the claim, that he should pay no interest under any circumstances. I was not aware that it had ever been examined by the Department, except so far as to say that there was no money to pay it, and hence it was unnecessary to look into it.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 97) supplementary to an act incorporating the Newsboys' Home, and providing for the relief of certain minor children in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 98) for the relief of Chauncey N. Noteware; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PARIS EXHIBITION.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to consider the expediency of passing a resolution expressive of the sense of the nation that the American department of the World's Exhibition at Paris shall not be opened on the Sabbath day.

INDIANA WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. MORTON. I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 32, to reimburse the State of Indiana for expenses incurred in repelling rebel raids during the late rebellion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORTON. I trust the Senator from Vermont will withdraw that motion. The executive business will keep for a day or two; but if this resolution is laid over it is gone.

Mr. SHERMAN. By leaving it now as the unfinished business it will come up in the morning at perhaps the most favorable time for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will be the unfinished business, and entitled to precedence.

Mr. MORTON. Yes; but that involves the loss of a day. A day's delay may be fatal to it, while the executive business will keep for a day or two.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is quite evident that this measure cannot be finished to-night. It is a claim of a nature that embraces a good deal of inquiry, and the subject will create considerable discussion. It involves a principle that interests my own State as, if it be adopted, we have similar claims. Inasmuch as my motion leaves this matter in a position where it will be the first business to-morrow, I think my friend from Indiana ought to yield, and I hope we shall proceed to consider the filling of the vacant offices.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 21, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BORTON.

The Journal of yesterday was partly read.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the further reading of the Journal was dispensed with by unanimous consent.

TWENTY PER CENT. INCREASED COMPENSATION.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to extend to the employes of the quartermaster and subsistence departments at Washington the provisions of the joint resolution giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service of the Government at Washington; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] that his joint resolution should be made broad enough to embrace other laborers in the employ of the Government in Washington, in the navy-yard for instance.

Mr. SCHENCK. When this subject was before the House, at its last session, it was stated that there had been an advance of wages made to those laborers. This resolution is meant to apply to those in the employ of the quartermaster and subsistence departments at Washington, who are not included under the provisions of the present law by some construction of the department, although it was supposed they would be covered by the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. There has been in point of fact, then, an increase in the wages of the laborers in the navy-yard here?

Mr. SCHENCK. So I understand.

Mr. JULIAN. The laboring men and mechanics in the navy-yard here have not had any late increase of their wages, and they are now absolutely suffering by reason of insufficient compensation. I hope the gentleman will include them.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to have them included if they have not yet received any advance of wages. But I think that matter better be inquired into, and if deemed necessary let a distinct proposition be introduced for their relief. I have confined this joint resolution to those who have been excluded by the express construction given to the present law.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I would ask the gentleman to modify his resolution so as to include the employes in the Government Printing Office, who I think are more poorly paid than any other employes of the Government. They are not included within the present law giving increased compensation to certain employes in the civil service of the Government at Washington.

Mr. SCHENCK. I prefer that gentlemen shall bring in separate propositions to include the cases which they may think demand additional legislation. I have embraced in this proposition two cases in which by construction the accounting officers have excluded persons whom Congress intended to include. If there are other cases which upon inquiry are found to be of the same meritorious character, I shall not object to any legislation which may be necessary to cover those cases; but I think they had better be included in separate propositions.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask the gentleman to yield to allow me to offer a separate proposition to meet the case to which I have referred, and take the sense of the House upon it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think we had better take the vote first on this proposition.

Mr. CHANLER. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he should include in his resolution the employes in the Patent Office. They have been asking us with great justice for an increase of pay, but have not been embraced in our legislation heretofore. I have no objection, of course, to paying the employes in the quartermaster department; but certainly it is hardly fair to do this thing by piecemeal when there are in the other departments cases fully as necessitous as any in this particular department.

Mr. SCHENCK. I can only answer the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] as I have answered other gentlemen. These two cases were intended to be included in the resolution which we passed, but by a construction of the accounting officers have been ruled out. I do not understand that other cases stand on the same footing. At any rate, I prefer to confine this resolution to that of which I have had knowledge brought to me by distinct information from the department, not expressing, however, any opposition to any extension of the provision which it may be deemed proper to make hereafter.

I demand the previous question.

Mr. DONNELLY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me, that I may offer an amendment to include those who are in charge of the steam fire-engines in connection with the quartermaster department.

Mr. SCHENCK. This does include them. I insist upon the call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the joint resolution,

Mr. WARD called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for the morning hour now commences; and the first business in order is the call of committees for reports.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (S. No. 61) to provide for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, and for other purposes.

The question was on ordering the bill to be read the third time.

The bill, which was read at length, provides in the first section that the State of Nebraska shall hereafter constitute one judicial district, and be called the district of Nebraska; and for said district a district judge, a marshal, and a district attorney of the United States shall be appointed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The second section proposes to enact that the district of Nebraska shall be attached to, and constitute a part of, the eighth judicial circuit; and a term of the circuit court and district court of the United States for said district is to be held in the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, on the first Monday of May and on the first Monday of November in each year.

The third section provides that the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Nebraska, and the judges thereof respectively, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction, and perform the same duties, possessed and performed by other circuit and district courts and judges of the United States, and shall be governed by the same laws and regulations.

It is provided in the fourth section that the district judge appointed for the district of Nebraska shall receive as his compensation the sum of $3,500 a year, payable in four equal installments, on the 1st days of January, April, July, and October of each year.

The fifth section proposes to enact that the marshal and district attorney of the United States for the said district of Nebraska shall severally possess the powers and perform the duties lawfully possessed and performed by similar officers in other districts of the United States, and shall for the services they perform receive the fees and compensation allowed by the act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853.

The sixth section provides that all cases of appeal or writ of error heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon any record from the supreme court of the Territory of Nebraska, may be heard and determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the mandate of execution or of further proceedings is to be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the circuit or district court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, or to the supreme court of the State of Nebraska, as the nature of said appeal or writ of error may require; and each of these courts is to be the successor of the supreme court of Nebraska Territory as to all such cases, with full power to hear and determine the same, and to award mesne or final process thereon. And from all judgments and decrees of the supreme court of the Territory of Nebraska, prior to its admission as a State, the parties to such judgments and decrees are to have the same right to prosecute appeals and writs of error to the Federal courts as they had under the laws of the United States prior to the admission of said State of Nebraska into the Union.

The seventh section proposes to enact that until a judge for said district shall be duly appointed the district judge of the United States for the district of Iowa shall act as the district judge for Nebraska, and shall have and exercise the same jurisdiction and powers in the district created by this act as he has in the district of Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the act for the admission of Nebraska into the Union did not provide for United States circuit and district courts there; hence it is necessary to pass this bill. I offer, not as coming from the Committee on the Judiciary, but on my own responsibility, the following amendment:

Add the following as a new section:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the associate justice of the Supreme Court assigned to the eighth circuit shall receive, in addition to his salary, the sum of $1,000 per annum, to defray his traveling expenses, to be paid in the same manner as his salary is now paid.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I think it ought to be stated to the House, in reference to the amendment just proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, that the majority of the committee thought it unwise as a precedent to allow to a judge of the Supreme Court pay for traveling expenses within his circuit. It is a part of the duty of a judge to follow the circuit in the performance of the business with which he is charged. To be sure, an allowance of this kind has been made in one instance—in the case of the judge of the ninth circuit. There was a stronger reason for the allowance in that case than can be urged in any other; but to allow this species of compensation generally would, it seems to me, result in evil.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I stated when I offered the amendment that it did not come from the committee; that I offered it simply on my own responsibility.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I understood that; but I wished to state the view of the committee on this question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state, in regard to this amendment, that the eighth circuit is the most extensive of the nine now existing.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa whether the salary of this judge was not raised by a bill which we passed in the latter part of the last session?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It was not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What is the salary of the judge?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Six thousand dollars for the associate judge of the United States allotted to the eighth circuit. There was no change made in the compensation of the members of the Supreme Court.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The salary of the judge is now fixed by law at $6,000. I wish to inquire further if any such salary is paid to any other judge except the judge of the circuit of California?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The same amount of salary is given to the judge of the ninth circuit; that is, the California and Oregon circuit. Mr. Speaker, I do not think, when the expenses of the eighth circuit are compared with those of the members allotted to any other circuit, this proposition will be considered any more than fair. It is a most extensive circuit in point of territory; one which embraces as much business if not more than any other, and requires the judge to be absent from his home nearly the whole year.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Allow me to suggest that the expenses which are allowed to the judge of the ninth circuit are for the purpose of paying for travel from California to Washington, and not on account of the extent of his district. The gentleman from Iowa thinks it would be right to give a judge of the circuit, as proposed by this amendment, traveling expenses because of the extent of his circuit. It seems to me there is no analogy between the two cases, no reason for the one growing out of the fact of the other.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The analogy is this: that the amount of travel done by the judge of the eighth circuit is greater than that performed by the judge of the ninth circuit, and he is required to be absent from his home a much greater part of the year than the judge who is allotted to the ninth circuit.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that this is a very inopportune moment to attempt to increase the salaries of justices of the Supreme Court. We are here now simply awaiting to consummate an important measure, and it is now proposed by this bill, or the amendment to it, to raise the salary of one of the justices who has been paid for some years the same salary as all the other judges of the Supreme Court, simply because he has an addition to his circuit.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is not the only reason.

Mr. SPALDING. It is proposed to give him an increased salary of $1,000 because he has this additional duty imposed upon him. The argument is unsound.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is not the argument I make at all; it is not because we are adding Nebraska to the circuit.

Mr. SPALDING. I want to say to the gentleman and to the House that all the other circuits are being enlarged from time to time, and as some of the justices cease to breathe and their numbers are reduced until they shall reach seven, their circuits must of course be enlarged until seven shall do the duty which is now done by nine. Now, when the Congress shall meet again for regular business we can, if we deem it necessary, increase the salaries of all the judges. But I do object at this closing hour of the session to raising the salary of one single judge. I think it is bad legislation, it is unprofitable legislation, it is dangerous legislation. We are always in more danger during the last hours of the session than during the preceding months, because business is carried through without due attention, without reflection, without being properly matured in the hands of the committee. I hope the gentleman will not take his own circuit and enlarge the salary of his justice and leave the other justices unprovided for.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will endeavor to give a reason for doing so.

Mr. SPALDING. I am not quite through yet. I desire to say that in my circuit the judge has to travel a great deal further than formerly. The circuit has recently been enlarged so as to embrace the States of Ohio, Michigan, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and the justice has to perform duties in all those States. Yet no one asks for an increase of his salary. Now, if the judge of the Iowa circuit is to have an increase of salary let us increase the salary of all the justices.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I should be entirely willing to increase the salaries of all the judges of the Supreme Court. I do not think the salaries they now receive are adequate to the labor exacted from them or the position they occupy. Now, sir, I am not asking that this compensation shall be given merely because Nebraska is added to the eighth judicial circuit. But it is because, as I have already stated, that circuit is one of the most extensive of the circuits, and one that requires more of the time of the judge than probably any other circuit in the entire number. I will leave this question for the House to determine. I think it is nothing more than fair and just that the judge should have the proposed increased compensation. I now call the previous question upon the bill and pending amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, to add to the bill the following:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the associate justice of the Supreme Court, assigned to the eighth circuit, shall receive, in addition to his salary, the sum of $1,000 per annum, to defray his traveling expenses, to be paid in the same manner as his salary is now paid.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TESTIMONY AFFECTING A SENATOR.

Mr. HULBURD. I am directed by a majority of the Committee on Public Expenditures of this House to submit a report accompanied by a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Public Expenditures, while engaged in the investigation ordered by the House, have taken testimony which apparently inculcates one or more members of the Senate, and in the opinion of the committee it is proper to report the fact to the House, that such action may be taken as comports with the courtesy due from one House of Congress to the other. The committee, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House having been informed by one of its committees that testimony has been brought to the knowledge of said committee, which testimony apparently inculcates one or more members of the Senate, the House therefore direct that all such testimony be transmitted to the Senate for its information.

Mr. HULBURD. I desire now to call the previous question upon this resolution.

Mr. SPALDING. I would inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBURD] if the adoption of this resolution would involve any further continuance of the present session of Congress?

Mr. HULBURD. I do not think it will.

Mr. TABER. Will my colleague yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. HULBURD. Certainly.

Mr. TABER. As one of the minority of the Committee on Public Expenditures I desire to say that I do not concur in the report made by the majority of the committee. To my mind the evidence that has been adduced before the committee is entirely insufficient to support the conclusion of the majority of the committee; and in order that the House may understand the question fully I will ask that the testimony be now read.

Mr. HULBURD. The House will recollect that the Committee on Public Expenditures were also instructed by the House to take into consideration the report and testimony submitted by the Committee on Public Expenditures of the last Congress. The report of the committee submitted to-day is based upon that testimony, together with the evidence which one witness has given before the committee of the present Congress.

Now, if the House should require the reading of all the testimony, it will probably take about six days to do it. I submit to the House that in this matter the conclusion to which the committee have come is based not only upon the testimony of the single witness examined by the committee of this Congress, but also upon the testimony taken by the committee of the last Congress during weeks of their investigation. If one portion of this testimony is to be read upon which to predicate the action of the House, then I must ask the House to order that the rest of the testimony shall also be read, if it shall take one day, or even one week as it will to read it.

After the previous question shall have been seconded, I will yield to members who may desire to speak upon this subject.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman.

Mr. HULBURD. Very well.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The House certainly cannot vote understandingly upon this question with the information now furnished to them. Even the gentleman does not pretend that the testimony upon which he commented the other day, standing alone, would justify the resolution he now asks the House to adopt. Now, it seems to me he cannot ask us to act upon testimony which is not presented to the House. The gentleman the other day gave us a very full commentary upon the testimony taken by the committee of the last session. Why does he not now state the additional facts that may have come to the knowledge of the committee of this House, so that we may act understandingly, and not send a virtual impeachment of one of the Senators of the United States to the other House of this Congress without knowing exactly what we are doing or upon what testimony our action is founded? I trust the gentleman will, at all events, give us a statement of the facts upon which he asks this extraordinary action of the House.

Mr. HULBURD. I have not the slightest objection to going into this matter and having the testimony of this witness read; but I submit to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the committee have reflected somewhat upon this subject, and the majority of the committee have come to the conclusion, after consultation on the part of the chairman with some members of the House, that it would be most decorous, most courteous, would afford the least occasion for scandal, if there be any scandal in the matter, to transmit this testimony with this resolution to the Senate for their information. If they regard it as of any moment, they will of course through an appropriate channel order an investigation. If they do not regard the matter as of moment, they will treat the resolution and evidence as a nullity. If the matter remains with the Committee on Public Expenditures, we cannot in courtesy to the Senate prosecute the investigation in that direction any further. It would be discourteous.

What shall we do with this testimony? We propose that, together with the testimony taken by the committee of the previous Congress, it shall be transmitted to the Senate for their information, without giving any special publicity to it or attracting to it unnecessarily any attention. This did seem to us, it does seem to us now, the most decorous and proper course we can possibly pursue in reference to this matter.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HULBURD. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKS. As I understand the view of my colleague, [Mr. TABER,] though I have had no conversation with him, his objection is not to the reference of this matter to the Senate, the appropriate body to sit in judgment upon its own members, but to the language which is twice used in the resolution—the words “apparently inculcates.” Now, I need not tell my colleague on the other side [Mr. HULBURD] the meaning of the word “inculcates.” It is a very hard word—a word which, in view of the signification of its root in the Latin, is almost the most offensive word which could be used in this connection. And although this word is qualified by the adverb “apparently,” I submit that the House is not quite ready to say that this evidence “apparently inculcates” two Senators. Though there is evidence upon the subject, the knowledge of that evidence is as yet confined to the committee, except so far as we can gather its purport from the scraps of it which have appeared in the newspapers. I am quite satisfied with the argument of my colleague on the other side that the matter should be referred to the Senate for their investigation or action, and that the testimony should be submitted to that body. But it seems to me that the common courtesy between the two Houses, apparently necessary for the preservation of the dignity of each and every member, should impress us with the importance of using, when sending such matter to a coordinate body, language which cannot be considered discourteous, and which will not seem to imply at the very start even an apparent condemnation.

I suggest, therefore, to my colleague that he modify the resolution by striking out the words “apparently inculcates” and inserting instead the words “has reference to.”

Mr. BROOMALL. “Affecting.”

Mr. HULBURD. I have no objection to modifying the resolution by striking out “inculcates” and inserting “affects.” But we must give some reason for this unusual course of proceeding.

Mr. BROOKS. I suggest that the gentleman insert instead of “apparently inculcates” the words “has important reference to;” so that the language will read, “which testimony has important reference to one or more Senators.”

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to put an inquiry to the Chair. If we should adopt this resolution and transmit to the Senate the testimony taken by our committee, in what relation would we stand to that testimony? Would it be under the control of the House for any purpose contemplated by the resolution under which it was taken? Would not the Senate have the exclusive control of the testimony?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer, certainly not. It is like transmitting copies of the files of the House to the Supreme Court, as is sometimes required.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not understand the resolution to refer to copies. Does it say copies of the testimony? I understand it refers the testimony as taken, and it was with that idea I suggested to the gentleman that it should be a copy only.

Mr. HULBURD. I submit to the suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a proper suggestion. Does the gentleman accept the modification of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS?]

Mr. HULBURD. No, sir.

Mr. TABER. I desire to say that I differ entirely with the committee in the conclusion to which they have come upon the testimony that has been produced before them. All the material testimony that was taken before them has been published in one or more of the New York papers, and I suppose has been read by every Senator. The Senate have had precisely the same kind of information laid before them to excite their suspicion as has been laid before this House, with the exception of the witnesses that have been examined by the committee. Now, if it is in order that the testimony be read here, I ask that a small portion of it may be read so that those who differ with the majority may be justified in their action. It strikes me it is a manifest impropriety for this House to undertake to determine whether a Senator is inculpated or not in a matter that may just as properly, if not with a great deal more propriety, be taken up in the Senate, and which they have the same reasons for taking up as we have, with, as I have stated, the single exception of the testimony that has been produced before the committee. I hope that the testimony will be read.

Mr. BROOMALL. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. HULBURD. Certainly.

Mr. BROOMALL. As a member of the committee I have no objection to the reading of the testimony asked for by my colleague on the committee. I wish, however, to have it distinctly understood that the majority of the committee, in reporting this resolution, do not volunteer the publicity sought to be given to this testimony, and if the House chooses to drag it out the responsibility is upon the House and not upon the committee. It seems to me that when a committee of this House comes, inadvertently or otherwise, upon testimony affecting a member of the other branch, the sooner, and with the less publicity, the matter can be got before the other branch, the better. There is a great deal of impropriety, I think, in our giving publicity to that which the Senate might not choose to publish, or might think of little importance. I know that it is asking something of this House to trust the judgment of one of its committees about the propriety of referring the testimony which has come within its reach immediately to the other branch without hearing or reading it; but it strikes me the House ought to have that much confidence in one of its committees.

Mr. BINGHAM. Allow me to make an inquiry: whether it is possible to communicate, under the existing rules of the Senate, anything from this House and prevent its being published by that very act to the Senate and to the world? Can it be done at all?

Mr. BROOMALL. I do not see why it cannot be.

Mr. BINGHAM. How can the Senate receive it without its being published?

Mr. BROOMALL. If I understand the inquiry correctly, it is whether it can be done without the Senate publishing it.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is just what I mean.

Mr. BROOMALL. I will say it is the business of the Senate to publish it if that body thinks proper to do so. The responsibility is with the Senate. What I mean to say is that there is some impropriety in our publishing this thing in advance of whatever action the Senate may take in the matter.

Mr. BINGHAM. My friend does not apprehend the point. The communication proposed to be made to the Senate is not simply this resolution offered to the House, but the testimony that has been taken which affects a Senator or Senators of the United States. Now, it having communicated it to the Senate, that body cannot receive and act upon it at all without publishing the testimony. Therefore the remark of the gentleman in regard to the duty of the Senate in publishing this matter to the world amounts to nothing at all.

Mr. BROOMALL. I understand the question entirely, and I think I understood it before. When the Senate shall receive this testimony, if it shall choose to publish it it may. If it does not so choose, I think it will not be impossible to have that testimony read in the Senate with closed doors. The Senate can withhold this testimony from the world if it so chooses.

Now, the testimony asked to be read here by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is the testimony of a single witness taken within the last two or three days. That testimony alone would amount to little or nothing. But that testimony, taken in connection with a considerable portion of the testimony interspersed throughout that which the committee of the last Congress took, and which it would take days to read, is what makes out the whole case contemplated by the committee. Now, if my colleague on this committee [Mr. TABER] desires it, I have no objection to the reading of this testimony. But I wish it to be understood that the action of the committee is not based upon that testimony alone, but also upon the testimony taken throughout a series of weeks and very voluminous, bearing occasionally upon this particular point, and at the same time largely upon a great many other points. The reading of the testimony of the one witness will enlighten this House but little. But, as the chairman of the committee [Mr. HULBURD] says, if the House wants all the facts before it acts, then we must content ourselves with staying here to have the testimony all waded through by the Clerk some six or ten days before we can adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. There is a difference of opinion between the members of the committee as to the effect of the testimony which has been given before them. A majority of the committee, it seems, think that the testimony inculcates one or more Senators. Another member of the committee, after reading the testimony, with equal candor perhaps thinks that it has no such effect. Now it has already been brought before the country by the committee that in the judgment of a majority of that committee the effect of that testimony does inculcate a Senator. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] if the committee can do more than that? If the testimony is not damaging to the character of Senators, can the committee do more than they have already done by spreading upon the records of this House and before the country the statement that they have come to the conclusion that the character of a Senator is impugned by this testimony?

Now, since there is a difference of opinion among the members of the committee, it seems to me that there is a likelihood of doing injustice to a Senator by this general conclusion expressed by the committee; and that it is due to Senators as well as to the House that all the facts should be spread before the House, in order that we may judge whether they do inculcate a Senator or not.

Mr. BROOMALL. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] I think has failed to understand the remarks I have made. I think there is no difference in the minds of the committee upon the effect of the testimony taken within the last two or three days. We all agree that that testimony standing alone would not be sufficient. My colleague upon the committee, [Mr. TABER,] who asks for the reading of that testimony, seems to be of the opinion that there is no other testimony of the kind. I have already stated that the committee base their request for this action of the House upon the testimony taken within the last two or three days, in connection with that taken throughout a course of weeks by the committee of the last Congress.

Now, I have already said that I have no objection to this testimony being read if it is the pleasure of the House; but I desire it to be understood that the committee do not volunteer the publicity of this testimony; and I wish the House also to understand that the testimony referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is only a small part of the testimony upon which the action of the committee is based.

Mr. NOELL. I wish to say in reference to this resolution that a part of the testimony upon which it is based was taken by a committee of the last House of which I was not a member. Now, without hearing the testimony of all of the witnesses together, and examining it with reference to the question at issue, I would be unwilling to support any such resolution as this.

Now, I do not understand that any committee appointed by this House and charged with certain specific duties have the right, or that it is within the province of that committee, to go outside of the duties with which they are charged and constitute themselves a grand inquisition to examine into the conduct of any citizen or officer whose conduct the committee have not been directed to investigate. This committee has been charged with an investigation into the conduct of a Federal officer, and yet in that investigation they undertake to inquire into the conduct of others with which they were not charged at all.

Now, sir, the impropriety of this thing shows itself perhaps in this case as forcibly as in any that could be presented. Here is a question on which the minds of the committee are not directed, originating before a committee which preceded us, a committee in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and by that committee certain statements were made, and the minds of this committee not being directed to that point, they not being charged with the investigation, took no pains, and could be expected to take no pains, to elicit the truth in regard to the transaction. They were not charged to inquire into the conduct of any Senator or of any person outside of the conduct of the one they were to inquire into. It seems to me that it is not in order in a case like this to take a piece of random evidence, taken by one committee, for another committee to take that without cross-examination, without seeing the witnesses, without any of the usual proceedings necessary to elicit the truth; I make the point of order that this committee cannot connect these two pieces of testimony together and frame them into a criminal proceeding against persons in reference to whom they were not charged to inquire. I make the point that the committee has no right to report any resolution of this kind, the subject not having been referred to them. They have no right, sir, to use disconnected portions of testimony.

Mr. BROOMALL. Does the gentleman raise the point of order on the resolution?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman makes the point of order the Chair overrules it. It is too late to make the point of order, as the resolution has been debated. If it had been made in time the Chair would have overruled it, as this whole subject of the New York custom-house has been referred to that committee.

Mr. BROOMALL. I only say in answer to my colleague on the committee that it did not set itself up as a general investigating committee into all the offenses against the United States. It was charged with a certain investigation, and it was strictly within the limits of the matter referred to it that this has come to light.

I will say now, as I have said already, if it is the pleasure of the House to hear the testimony read to which my colleague on the committee refers, I think the majority of the committee will make no objection to it, always letting it be understood that this is but a small portion of the entire case, and that the House will be but little enlightened after hearing this as to the entire matter within the scope of the committee's resolution. I have already said it would take weeks to get the entire information, and I think the House will have to trust something to the judgment and honesty of the committee in matters of this sort. I am ready to yield to hear that testimony read.

Mr. HULBURD. With the leave of the House, I ask that the resolution may be amended so that it will read "apparently affects" instead of "inculcates." I understand that will meet with my colleague's views.

Mr. BROOKS. -I have no objection to that. "Affects" is an innocent word.

Mr. BROOMALL. But it will do.

Mr. HULBURD demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. TABER demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 19.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HULBURD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLORADO CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a privileged question. The resolution of the House authorized the Committee of Elections to require notice in the Colorado contested-election case and to extend the time for taking testimony. I am instructed by the committee to say they have acted on the subject; and I ask that the resolution I send up shall be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That A. C. Hunt, the contestant in this case, be allowed to serve notice on George M. Chilcott, sitting Delegate from the Territory of Colorado, within the time allowed by law, counting the 20th day of March, 1867, as the day upon which the result of the election was determined; and the service of answer by the sitting member and all proceedings subsequent shall conform to the provisions of the act of February 19, 1851, except that one hundred days shall be allowed for taking evidence; and the testimony already taken shall not be considered by the committee.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to say this action had the unanimous concurrence of the committee. It requires no action of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it had better be adopted by the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

HENRY A. SMYTHIE.

Mr. HULBURD, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, reported the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that Henry A. Smythie should be immediately removed from the office of collector of the port of New York; and that the Clerk of the House cause a certified copy of this resolution to be laid before the President of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. HULBURD. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Without going into the merits of the question as to the conduct of the collector of the port of New York—

Mr. WOOD. May I inquire whether this resolution is before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is before the House.

Mr. WOOD. Did the Chair ask whether there was objection?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how objection could prevent its introduction. The subject was referred to the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. I was about saying, without going into the merits of the question as to the conduct of the collector of the port of New York, I desire simply to call the attention of the House to the precedent proposed to be established. He proposes, as I understand, first that the House shall vote a want of confidence in an executive officer, and secondly that the House shall ask that officer to be removed. I believe that according to the custom of Parliament this House asks nothing of the President of the United States; we have one way in which to demand that an officer shall be removed, and that is by impeachment and in no other way. We do not demand it of his superior, we do not demand it of his coconspirator, but we demand it in the name of the people of the United States, of the high court of justice established by the Constitution for the purpose of trying such questions; and therefore I do not want to adopt in free and independent America as the voice of the people the practice of the Parliament, of the Commons of Great Britain, of asking the king or intimating to the king we have not confidence in his officers and humbly implore his gracious Majesty if he will be kind enough to listen to the voice of his faithful Commons. Let us maintain the high place and dignity of a coordinate branch of the Government; and if the House do find on that question—and I express no opinion, because I have none—they have enough to justify them, I have confidence in the House that we will speak the voice of the people in the only form known to the Constitution.

Again, sir, I have another objection. If the President would consent to remove on our request it would be the trial of a man behind his back, when he has no opportunity to be heard by himself or his counsel. I pray, however, in making this observation I shall not be understood as throwing the slightest blame or imputation on the committee. I speak of the precedent. It would be a precedent that a high officer might be removed without the possibility of being heard himself or by his counsel, which, I think, is contrary to the genius of our institutions. They are for old-fashioned Saxon fair play.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let me inquire of the gentleman, if I will not interrupt him, whether the testimony upon which this resolution rests has ever been published to the House?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know that it has been.

Mr. BROOMALL. It has all been published as it was reported to the House.

Mr. BUTLER. But the point which I think my friend appreciates is that we have not heard the other side.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do appreciate it.

Mr. BUTLER. I have been brought up in that school which demands audi alteram partem. But without going into this latter consideration I ground myself first upon the dignity and rights of the House, the constitutional mode in which it should speak, and claim that we shall in no degree by the shadow of a shade lay down our high prerogative.

I beg pardon for having detained the House on this question. Gentlemen who are experts in parliamentary learning will argue the question much better than I can.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield me three minutes.

Mr. HULBURD. I do so.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not my purpose in any manner whatever to defend or palliate the conduct of Mr. Smythe. With that I have nothing to do. But as a member of this House I have a right to suggest that the House should not be placed in a wrong position upon this subject or upon any other. We have nothing whatever to do with the executive department of the Government. If this House thinks Collector Smythe has been guilty of malfeasance it is within its province to impeach him as far as is provided in the Constitution. But that this House should travel out of the line of custom or the path of duty and express an opinion upon the removal of an officer is a thing that, in my judgment, is entirely wrong.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me a single word? Suppose we should ask the President of the United States to remove Mr. Smythe and he should say he would not do it; where would we be then?

Mr. RANDALL. If the President would say what I would say, he would tell you to mind your own business. [Laughter.]

Now, while I think it due to myself to say that this man Smythe should be got rid of in a proper manner, if not for malfeasance, as alleged by the committee, certainly for his folly and total unfitness for the position to which the President assigned him—

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the resolution goes over till tomorrow.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 16) fixing the rate of duty on umbrellas and on wire spiral furniture springs; when the Speaker signed the same.

DESTITUTE IN THE SOUTH AND SOUTHWEST.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 16) for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States; and pending that motion I move that all general debate upon the resolution be terminated in two minutes.

The question being taken on the latter motion, it was agreed to—ayes 52, noes 30.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole. There are a number of bills on the Speaker's table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 56, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Archer, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barnes, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Churchill, Cornell, Finney, Fox, Geiz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Hayes, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Julian, Kerr, Ketcham, Kootz, Lufkin, Lincoln, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, Miller, Morrill, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Orin, Peters, Pile, Plants, Poland, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Stewart, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Van Aernam, Van Aiken, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Wood, and Woodbridge—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Butler, Calk, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corvode, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Gravelly, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Judd, Kitchen, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Moore, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Polesley, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Upson, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and Windom—56.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Boutwell, Bromwell, Burr, Cullom, Dawes, Denison, Donnelly, Ela, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Humphrey, Kelley, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, McCullough, Moorhead, Morgan, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Selye, Stone, Taber, Thomas, William B. Washburn, John T. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—36.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLAINE in the chair), and resumed the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 16, for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States.

The pending question was on the amendment of Mr. BINGHAM, to add to the proviso offered by Mr. Banks the following:

And provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used for the purpose aforesaid until all unexpended appropriations heretofore made by existing law for the purpose of the Freedmen's Bureau, to supply food, shall have been first applied to the purpose as herein specified, under the direction of the Commissioner of said Bureau.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] to withdraw his pending amendment, so that I may offer an amendment to the body of the bill.

Mr. BANKS. I withdraw my amendment for the purpose stated.

Mr. BINGHAM. I now withdraw my amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and move to strike out all after the word "prescribed" in the original resolution, as follows:

And that the sum of $1,000,000 be hereby appropriated from funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of the said Bureau for the purchase and issue of the said supplies of food.

And insert in lieu thereof:

And to that end the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, through the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, to apply so much as he may deem necessary for the purposes aforesaid of the unexpended moneys heretofore appropriated to supply freedmen and refugees with provisions or rations.

So that the resolution will read as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, empowered and instructed to issue supplies of food sufficient to prevent starvation and extreme want to any and all classes of persons in those southern and southwestern States where the failure of the crops and other causes have occasioned wide-spread destitution; that the issues be made through the Freedmen's Bureau under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe. And to that end the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, through the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, to apply so much as he may deem necessary for the purposes aforesaid of the unexpended moneys heretofore appropriated to supply freedmen and refugees with provisions or rations.

I ask the attention of the committee to this fact: by the original resolution an appropriation of $1,000,000 has been directed, and this amount does not make one dollar of additional appropriation, but simply enables the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau to extend this relief, according to the terms of the original resolution, to such as are famishing for bread in the southern and southwestern States out of the existing appropriations, without regard to classes.

I desire to correct what is manifestly a misapprehension which many gentlemen, I have no doubt, honestly entertain. I have learned in such a way as to render it perfectly certain—and a requirement of an official answer by this House will confirm what I say—that the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, although he considers the existing appropriation by law sufficient for that purpose, is, nevertheless, so limited and restrained by the exact terms of the statute as that he cannot provide bread for the famishing men, women, and children of the South and Southwest.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose to receive several messages in writing from the President of the United States, communicated by Mr. W. G. MOORE.

RELIEF OF DESTITUTE IN THE SOUTH—AGAIN.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order. I think the rule recently adopted requires these messages to be immediately reported at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. We are in committee now and not in the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope, then, that the committee will rise for that purpose.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope it will not do any such thing.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand the rule is imperative. If there is a veto message it is important that it should be presented.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that there is no veto message communicated.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I wish to make an inquiry of my colleague. I trust I shall be able to vote for his proposition, but I wish to understand whether this amendment will become incorporated in the Freedmen's Bureau law so as to permanently enlarge the power of the officer at the head of that bureau as to the distribution of the appropriation?

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand it becomes incorporated this far: that it extends the privilege of the Freedmen's Bureau, subject to the limitation that the powers of the bureau so extended to persons other than freedmen shall expire when the unexpended appropriation shall have been exhausted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, in the first place I would like to inquire to what time debate is limited?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes for and five minutes against each amendment. The pending amendment is that which has been offered and advocated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.] The Chair understands the gentleman from Massachusetts to rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I propose, Mr. Chairman, to present a few suggestions for the purpose of showing why the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio should not be adopted; and I think that, in view of the fact that the gentleman has spoken three times on this question, I shall ask him to interpose his good offices and his great influence with the House to secure for me the privilege of speaking somewhat longer than five minutes. I will promise not to consume very much time.

In the first place, let us see what the Freedmen's Bureau has done. I speak from official reports. During the year ending November 1, 1866, by order of the President of the United States, two hundred and eighty-seven thousand one hundred and twenty-two acres of land and two thousand six hundred and five pieces of town property, amounting altogether to more than ten million dollars, were taken from the freedmen, to whose benefit they had been appropriated by act of Congress, and returned to the white men of the South who had been engaged in the rebellion. We are now asked to aid still further the white men at the expense of the freedmen.

What else has been done? During the fifteen months closing with August, 1866, as appears by the report of General Howard, four million five hundred and seven thousand nine hundred and twenty-two rations were distributed to refugees in the South, in addition to the rations furnished to freedmen. General Howard further states:

"The number of rations issued to the colored people has constantly decreased. They have found labor, for which they have received support and in some cases good wages. Although many complaints are made of the amount of rations issued to the freedmen, the fact of the constant decrease of their demands is very creditable. The issue to whites increased until June 30, 1866, when the issues to freedmen and refugees were about equal throughout the South."

Again, sir, at the request of the Governor of Alabama, rations to the amount of $40,000 per month for the period of three months were issued in the State of Alabama, principally for the relief of the white people. Yet, notwithstanding all this expenditure, we are asked to encroach still further upon the provision made for the freedmen, for the sake of aiding whom? Not merely the women and the children, not merely the sick and the disabled, but the able-bodied rebel, who, lounging at the corner grocery, refuses to work, while the "mudsills" of the North are obliged to work in order that they may pay taxes for the support of the Government. Shall the "mudsills" of the North be taxed to support in lazy, whisky-drinking idleness the self-styled "aristocracy" of the South?

And we are told that, after we have for such a purpose as this diverted a million or two millions of the money appropriated for the benefit of the freedmen we are to bring in a deficiency bill to supply the amount thus withdrawn from the legitimate purposes of the Freedmen's Bureau. For my part I am opposed to such legislation, and I desire to enter my protest against it in every form, even though the legislative experience—I was about to say "chicanery"—of my friend from Ohio restricts me to five minutes in which to enter my protest against what he has advocated in his speech of an hour.

It is said, sir, that the people of the South are starving, and I accept that statement as fact. My friend from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] told us that this was the work of the Lord, quoting the passage, "Vengeance is mine: I will repay, saith the Lord." Be it so. It would seem as if an avenging Providence had sent this starvation especially upon those parts of the country where the Union prisoners were starved: in the vicinity of Richmond and Salisbury and Andersonville and Millen and other places in the South where our soldiers underwent so much suffering. The men and women who stood by and viewed without compassion the miseries endured by our noble soldiers will, if they experience a little starvation themselves, be able to realize what was suffered in southern prisons by those who fought our battles.

40TH CONG. 1ST SESS.—No. 17.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope we will have the vote now.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, from the commencement of this discussion my mind has somewhat wavered in regard to the correct determination of this matter. It is in obedience to the instincts implanted in our nature to be charitable, benevolent, and kind, and in obedience to the civilization of the age I was inclined to vote for the resolution as it came from the Senate; but when the gentlemen on the other side of the House made their elaborate arguments in support of the proposition, when the gentleman in particular—I allude to the gentleman from New York—said we might give this donation of $1,500,000 as a premium for our persecution of the rebels, I was brought to a stand. Sir, I can fully appreciate the argument of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] who sits before me, when he says his son was reduced to the point of starvation in the rebel prisons.

Mr. COVODE. If the gentleman will indulge me, I will state that I sent quite a number of boxes of provisions to the South during the war when our men in their prisons were starving, which were forwarded under General BUTLER from Fortress Monroe, under flag of truce; but, sir, not one of them ever reached its destination. That is my donation.

Mr. SPALDING. I have but little time. I wish to say I can appreciate the force of the argument or appeal made to us when he instances the condition of our starving brothers and sons in rebel prisons. None of us can contemplate those scenes without emotions of horror. They were not only starved, but we recollect the "dead line," to which they were induced to crawl with the offer of food, and if they passed the line they were shot dead for thus transgressing the rules. We cannot hold such scenes in too much horror.

I had two sons, my only two sons, dragged to a rebel prison. They were not, to be sure, reduced to the point of starvation, but they were reduced to much suffering. Now, if these two boys had been reduced, as the son of my friend, to the point of starvation at Salisbury, if I saw the man who reduced them to the starving point at my door-stone at the point of starvation I could not resist the appeal to my humanity to give a crust of bread to save that dying rebel from starvation.

I object to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER,] because it is not offered in good faith. We are endeavoring to take care of the widows and orphans of our soldiers who served in the war. The gentleman does not say we are paying $30,000,000 a year to the widows and orphans of our soldiers. They are not reduced to starvation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SPALDING. One word more. The question with me is one of fact. If these men of the South, rebels though they be, murderers of our sons and brothers though they may be justly charged, if they are starving, or about to starve, I say let the Freedmen's Bureau feed them. I approve of the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

Mr. PILE. Is a substitute in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order at this time.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, in order to show the feeling of the soldiers of the Army who suffered in the prisons of the South in relation to giving food to the starving people of the lately rebellious States, I propose to read an extract from a letter of a Union soldier living in my own district. He says:

"I recall the horrors of rebel prisons, where I spent over fourteen months. At one time in Charleston jail five of us were in one small, condemned cell. Three were sick with fever. We had no medical attendance. We had for food seven hard biscuits each week and one pound of rusty bacon. With all this experience of what it is to be hungry, I think I ought to be capable of judging rightly in regard to that charity which is due to others; and though I hate the rebels bitterly, and remember how they starved us in their dungeons, yet I say, now that they are in want and are starving, let us feed them. It will be but a fitting exemplification of that 'charity which suffereth long and is kind, which vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up.'

"To refuse to extend aid to starving women and children because their fathers and brothers and husbands and sons were guilty of starving our soldiers is a part of that same spirit which actuated them in their treatment of our prisoners."

"As one whose health has been permanently ruined by months of starvation in rebel prisons I make an appeal in favor of feeding these rebels, not with a false sympathy for their present position, but because I believe in feeding the hungry and clothing the naked, however great may be their crimes."

This is an answer to the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts that the Union soldiers of the Army are not in favor of this resolution.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Who wrote the letters Mr. Greeley indorses?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. This is a letter in a paper edited by the gentleman's particular friend, a member of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. I do not hesitate to say that the letter expresses the opinion of our soldiers who have suffered starvation in the prisons of the South.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Chairman, I presume some in this House have suffered as prisoners, but I do not consider that as an argument bearing on this question.

But I will call the gentleman's attention to another thing. It is not important to this House whether the soldiers are for this joint resolution or against it. The important thing, sir, is to know whether it is right and meets with the approval of gentlemen's consciences. If, however, the gentleman will look at the resolutions passed by the association of soldiers in the District of Columbia, in New York, and in the West he will find they are almost unanimous against the passage of this joint resolution. In a meeting called by the soldiers, known in the District of Columbia as Post No. 1, they passed the resolutions which were published in the Chronicle.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I recollect very well the resolution referred to by the gentleman from Illinois. It purports to emanate from "The Grand Army of the Republic," and thanking General LOGAN and General BUTLER for their manly opposition to this joint resolution. It seems to me to be like an unappreciative audience at the play, applauding the player in his weakest part. I hope there is enough of humanity in Congress to pass the resolution. I do not know what this "Grand Army of the Republic" may be, but in my judgment a portion of their last resolution, both in its letter and its spirit, seems to be wanting in those elements of nobleness and charity which distinguish the brave man from the coward.

Mr. BROOMALL. The gentleman, I understand, withdraws his amendment, and I renew it.

Mr. Chairman, while I am not willing to vote additional money for this purpose, yet I am willing to devote the money already appropriated to the Freedmen's Bureau to one of the identical objects for which that bureau was established, as understood by the Commissioner himself. I believe it is well known that in the exercise of his duties he did not inquire when he saw cases of extreme suffering whether the sufferers were residents or refugees, or even whether they had been rebels or not, before giving them the necessary relief. I believe it is known that such was the condition of things up to May last, when the President of the United States made his first attack upon the Freedmen's Bureau. I know that in May and June last there were distributed in the district embracing Kentucky and Tennessee seven thousand one hundred rations to negroes and seventy-four thousand three hundred rations to white men; and I know from General Fisk, the upright and benevolent officer who had charge of that district at that time, that no inquiry was made whether these men were strictly within the meaning of the term refugees or not; the only inquiry was whether or not they were starving. But in June or July last orders came from Washington to that particular district forbidding the use of this money for any other purpose than that which came within the strict meaning of the law; and while there I knew of cases of extreme suffering on the part of persons who had been as loyal to the Government as any gentleman in this House, but who could not be relieved because they were residents and not refugees within the strict meaning of the law.

I had prepared and intended to offer for this entire joint resolution what I conceived to be necessary to restore the original construction put upon the Freedmen's Bureau laws by the Commissioner of the bureau himself; and it is in these words:

That the several acts of Congress relating to the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands shall be so construed as to permit the Commissioner of the said bureau, in his discretion, to extend relief to cases of extreme suffering, whether the sufferers are embraced within the meaning of the terms refugees and freedmen or not.

On reading the joint resolution as now modified by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] I find, if I understand the English language, that it means precisely the same thing, and therefore I shall vote for it, and I trust it will pass the committee and be reported to the House. I think the humane and Christian gentleman standing at the head of the bureau may be trusted to extend this relief on the part of the Government to proper cases. I have no fear of the power being abused in his hands.

Many of these people are innocent of all crime against the Government. Very many of those who are guilty were deluded and beguiled by false leaders into treason. It is the duty of our Government temporarily while things are unsettled in the South, pending the business of reconstruction, to protect them at least against starvation. The great crime was not theirs. They were at most but followers. It is the misfortune of the South that under the peculiar policy of the present Executive the greatest punishment is falling upon the least guilty.

It is stated to me by those around me that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] does not mean that which my proposed amendment does. And if it does not, then I want my amendment substituted for his.

Mr. BINGHAM. It does mean that, and I do not care who states to the contrary.

Mr. BROOMALL. And I believe it does.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to detain the Committee of the Whole by any discussion of the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.] But I desire to say a few words in reply to some remarks that have been made by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE.]

Sir, I cannot see what the question of bravery or soldiery conduct has to do with the passage or defeat of this joint resolution. I was very sorry to hear the gentleman from Vermont say that the resolutions of the soldiers alluded to by me only show the distinction between brave men and cowards. I dislike to hear such remarks; I do not think they come with good grace from any man who has never had the opportunity of testing his own courage or determining whether he is a brave man or not. I do not think such a man should undertake to question the bravery of any other man.

Now, these soldiers passed these resolutions because they thought Congress had no right to pass this joint resolution appropriating this amount of money for charitable purposes; not at all in reference to bravery or soldiery conduct or soldiery bearing.

Now, I opposed the passage of this joint resolution because I thought it was wrong; and I now say to the gentleman that if the House is to pass this joint resolution appro-riating $1,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States to assist the suffering people of the South, then I shall at the proper time offer an amendment to appropriate $1,000,000 to assist the suffering people in the valleys of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, who have been driven from their homes and have had their property destroyed by the late freshet in those two rivers. I propose to offer it because I believe the people of the loyal portions of this country have the same right to the protection of the law and the charity of the Government that the people of the disloyal sections have. It is not asked by the people of my State or the people of Indiana or Missouri. But they are entitled to it upon the same principle that those are entitled to it whom gentlemen are so anxious to give this charity to, who live within the confines of the States where treason once existed, and where I believe it still exists.

That is all I desire to say: to make that reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE,] and to give notice of the amendment I propose to offer.

Mr. BROOMALL. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I renew the amendment to the amendment, because I understand I can get the opportunity to speak now only by moving some amendment which I do not mean. That is a new revelation to me in my short experience in legislative life.

I desire to reply to some of the observations that fell from the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE,] as well as to call the attention of the House to the course pursued by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

The gentleman from Vermont was kind enough the other day to tell the House that I was no statesman. Now, I agree to that; and I am sorry such is the fact. I just escaped being a statesman, I suppose, by not being elected to the Thirty-Ninth Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I simply desire to state to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that I said no such thing, made no such charge, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. BUTLER. Then he means to say that I am a statesman, [laughter,] and I am very much obliged to him. Now, a word more in regard to the action of the soldiers of the grand Army of the Republic. I received from them unsolicited and unasked, a resolution approving my course. And so long as I have the approval of the soldiers of the Army, I can very well do without the approval of those who were engaged in wearing out the soft cushions of the seats in this House during the entire war; I can survive the one if I have the other.

Now, I am not here to say anything that may be considered at all personal in its character. But I desire to ask the attention of the House to the fairness of the course of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman has no right to raise a question of fairness upon my conduct here at this time of day.

Mr. BUTLER. What does the gentleman say?

Mr. BINGHAM. I raise the point of order that the gentleman has no right to reflect upon my conduct here by raising the question of fairness.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, unfairness, then; I will admit that I was mistaken in calling it a question of fairness. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. BUTLER. I will withdraw the question of fairness; I admit that none can be raised. Will that do? [Laughter.]

Now, in regard to this joint resolution, I have one further consideration to present. I ask members here if they are ready to vote an appropriation of $1,000,000 in any form before they decide the question which is involved in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, in front of me, [Mr. SCHENCK?]

That amendment provides that district commanders may relieve the distressed people of their districts by distributing aid to them from the stores of the Army, and then tax the rich rebels to pay for those stores.

Gentlemen talk about confiscation, and say that this is unconstitutional. Now, it would seem that there is nothing constitutional except to put the hand into the Treasury of the United States. As I have said already, I ask no confiscation of any rebel property; but I ask that the rich of the community shall support the poor and suffering.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing all debate upon the joint resolution and the pending amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. That will cut off all debate.

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly it will.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have offered an amendment, upon which I should like to speak for five minutes, inasmuch as my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] has spoken an hour.

Mr. BINGHAM. I insist upon my motion, that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAINE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, according to order, had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly Senate joint resolution No. 16, for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BINGHAM. I now move that when the House again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, and resume the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 16, all debate upon the joint resolution and amendments thereto shall terminate in five minutes.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I rise to a question of order. I would ask the Chair if it is in order to move to close all debate on the entire joint resolution or only on the pending section?

The SPEAKER. There is but one section.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I should think we might afford two sections for an appropriation of $1,000,000.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move to amend the motion of my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] by substituting "two hours" for "five minutes." I desire to say a few words on this joint resolution myself.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I ask that the messages received from the President to-day be now laid before the House.

No objection was made.

WITHDRAWAL OF FRENCH FROM MEXICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to the House of Representatives, in answer to their resolution of the 18th instant, a report from the Secretary of State, with an accompanying paper.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, March 20, 1867.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that this message is in answer to a resolution of the House, calling for information in relation to the withdrawal of the French troops from Mexico.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the message and accompanying paper be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ARREST OF AMERICANS IN ENGLAND, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House, the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th instant, relative to the arrest, imprisonment, and treatment of American citizens in Great Britain or its Provinces, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State on the subject.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, March 20, 1867.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the resolution and accompanying paper be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

FENIAN TRIALS IN CANADA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit to the House of Representatives, in answer to their resolution of the 18th instant, a report from the Secretary of State, with its accompanying papers.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, March 20, 1867.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands this to be in answer to a resolution of the House calling for information in relation to the late trials of United States citizens in Canada.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the message and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he is informed that no further message from the President may be expected to-day.

Mr. SCOFIELD, (at two o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 46, noes 62.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. SCOFIELD called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division, there were—ayes seventeen, noes not counted.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. SCOFIELD called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, do not do that.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will withdraw the call for tellers and for yeas and nays, if it is understood that we shall have in the Committee of the Whole more than five minutes allowed for debate.

The motion to adjourn accordingly was not agreed to.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, that there be allowed two hours for debate upon Senate joint resolution No. 16, instead of five minutes as proposed by Mr. BINGHAM.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 44, noes 61.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. BINGHAM, that when the House again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, all general debate terminate in five minutes.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend the motion by striking out "five minutes" and inserting in lieu thereof "one hour."

Mr. BINGHAM. All that I wish to say is this—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order except by unanimous consent.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. BINGHAM. I modify my motion so as to say "twenty minutes" instead of "five minutes."

Mr. BROOMALL. I insist on my amendment, so as to allow one hour for debate instead of twenty minutes.

The amendment was agreed to; there being—ayes 58, noes 56.

The motion of Mr. BINGHAM, as amended, was adopted.

RELIEF OF DESTITUTE IN THE SOUTH—AGAIN.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 16) for the relief of the destitute of the southern and southwestern States.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLAINE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 16, for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to inquire whether there is an amendment pending.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending to strike out the last word, which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has spoken in favor of, but which no one has opposed.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, sir, I am opposed to it because it will tend, as they say, to "perfect" the original bill.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to a fact of which gentlemen seem to have lost sight, that there is pending a substitute for the substitute offered originally by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER.] That gentleman proposed that instead of devoting $1,000,000, as provided in the Senate bill, for the relief of these persons at the South, who are represented to be in circumstances of destitution, we shall appropriate that amount for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the Union soldiers who were starved to death in rebel prisons. Subsequently, the gentleman submitted another substitute, which, for the sake of simplifying the position of the question, I, with his consent, adopted as my own, proposing not to deny help to the destitute in the South, but only to provide a different mode of furnishing such help, so that instead of taking the necessary means from the Treasury of the United States, the means shall be raised by assessment upon the richer rebels themselves.

If there be in the South any destitute persons beyond those who are now provided for through the Freedmen's Bureau I am not opposed to extending aid to them. But just here I will say I have not a doubt that this whole matter is greatly exaggerated. Where ever work is to be done, wherever honest labor is to be put forth by men for their own support, no people are more apt to call upon Hercules instead of putting their own shoulders to the wheel than these same southern rebels. While they had their negroes to work for them we did not hear this cry for assistance; but this means of support being taken away none are more ready than they to make negroes of the "mudsills" of the North, who are expected cheerfully to work and pay taxes for the support of those who despise them.

I desire to say also that gentlemen who are in favor of the original bill have pursued here a course not particularly consistent with good taste, however wise it may be in any other aspect. Having claimed for themselves, because they support this appropriation of $1,000,000, all the liberality and all the courage, the next thing I suppose will be to claim, so far as this debate is concerned, all the magnanimity. After having exhausted the argument on this side in speeches of an hour's length, some gentlemen having spoken two or three times, they still claim to entertain and amuse, if not instruct, the House by reading anonymous articles published in newspapers at the North, professing to give what some soldier has said upon this subject.

Sir, instead of quoting an anonymous letter in order to furnish some testimony on this subject of destitution at the South, I propose to call to the witness-stand a rebel himself. Everybody knows who Pirate Semmes is, that infernal villain who swept the seas in order to destroy the commerce of this country as an indirect way of breaking down the Government to which he, as a scoundrel rebel, was opposed. That pirate rebel Semmes has become an editor after going through various mutations. Hear what he says on "the labor question" in the Memphis Bulletin, which he now conducts. His testimony is as follows:

"We could scour the pine woods of Mississippi and Alabama to-morrow, and drive before us hundreds and thousands of active, stalwart young white laborers, who are wasting their time in utter and entire idleness, because they are too proud or too lazy to work. Many of the families to which these young vagabonds belong are almost in a starving condition, some of them being the actual recipients of charity from the Freedmen's Bureau."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the first word.

Now, then, sir, having produced the testimony of a rebel himself, and therefore not anonymous testimony, I am willing to present it as a set-off against any anonymous publication which may have found its way into the New York Times, or any other paper, intended to bolster up this cause.

This editor bears testimony on another point, to which I wish to call the attention of the House. He says these lazy vagabonds, these stalwart bodied men, who are drifting about through these southern States where this destitution is said most to prevail, are doing so leaving their families and connections in almost a starving condition. The first proposition I make upon that is, that they shall be required to go to work and support themselves and their starving families; and the next is that the testimony proves what I affirmed yesterday, when he goes on to say those starving families are driven to get help from the Freedmen's Bureau. That Freedmen's Bureau is in fact, and we know it to be so, in the name of refugees, giving to all persons, men, women, and children, who come to them in a state of destitution.

Now, sir, what have we done for the Freedmen's Bureau? We have given some ten or twelve million of dollars in various appropriations for subsistence and aid to the destitute of the South. We have given it to freedmen and refugees, but in practice all, black and white, are treated as refugees who come in apparent destitution and demand help from the agents of the bureau. Here is a rebel from the South admitting that the families of these lazy vagabonds are at this very time receiving this help from the Freedmen's Bureau, which they need not receive but for the laziness of those who ought to support them. Yet we are asked either to divert the money already appropriated for the Freedmen's Bureau to feed such lazy vagabonds, or else to add, as the Senate proposes, $1,000,000 in addition to what we have already appropriated.

What does my amendment propose? It proposes to tax those who are able in the South to support their own poor. We have this power over them. We can direct it to be exercised through our military commanders. My word for it you will find it to be a wholesome power.

I have studied this rebel animal in different points of view, and I have always found this to be the fact in regard to him, let him be of whatever variety or species he may: whenever you do toward him any act of magnanimity he is sure to construe it into some concession made to his superiority, or to attribute it to some timidity on your part, by which you are afraid to deny to him what he demands. Instead, therefore, of taking money out of the public Treasury to be thus construed into an act of apprehension on our part that unless we coax them they will do further mischief, I would say let their poor be fed and make them feed them themselves.

I have had a little experience in this matter in a small way. When in command of one of the military departments of this Government during the late war, I found the rebels in Harford county, Maryland, were disposed to burn down, and did burn down, the property of those officers of the United States who were engaged in enforcing the draft. But it was easily stopped in this way: by ascertaining from the county records the assessable property in the vicinity of the property thus destroyed, having an appraisement made of the property burned, and then distributing the assessment for five miles around, so as to make these people pay for the property to which the torch had been thus applied. After that was done twice no more property was burned.

Now, if we make these richer rebels pay for the support of their destitute laboring population there will not be much more wailing coming up from the South, nor much more occasion for the gentleman from Vermont to make one of these poetic speeches in which, as is the case with other poetry, he seems to draw upon his imagination for facts as well as figures.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have occupied no part of the time of the committee, and I would not do so now but that I am unwilling to go upon the record by voting for or against any of the propositions before us without a few words in explanation of my position. To understand the questions we are called upon to decide a brief examination of existing laws is necessary. By the original Freedmen's Bureau law it is provided:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War may direct such issues of provisions, clothing, and fuel as he may deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen and their wives and children, under such rules and regulations as he may direct."—Freedmen's Bureau Act of March 3, 1865; 13 United States Statutes-at-Large, 508.

The act of July 16, 1866, to continue in force the Freedmen's Bureau law provides:

"SEC. 5. That the second section of the act to which this is an amendment shall be deemed to authorize the Secretary of War to issue such medical stores or other supplies and transportation, and afford such medical or other aid as may be needful for the purposes named in said section: Provided, That no person shall be deemed 'destitute,' 'suffering,' or 'dependent upon the Government for support' within the meaning of this act, who is able to find employment, and could by proper industry or exertion avoid such destitution, suffering, or dependence."—14 United States Statutes-at-Large, 173.

It will be seen that these acts extend relief to two classes of cases. "The destitute and suffering refugees and their wives and children," constitute the first of these classes. This designation embraces that portion of the white people of the South who, "through good and through evil report," during all the dreary years of the rebellion still cling to the flag of the Union, and for their loyalty were driven from their homes, in numberless cases despoiled of their property, and thus were left in a destitute and suffering condition. The next class of people relieved by these laws is designated as the "destitute and suffering freedmen and their wives and children."

I scarcely need remark that the freedmen were always loyal, so much so that the rebel congress and the rebel leaders never dared to attempt to arm them in aid of rebellion. These two classes of people thus protected from the horrors and torture of starvation, constitute in all probability full three fourths of all the destitute and suffering in the rebel States.

The appropriations made by Congress for the charitable and humane purposes I have named, were, in the appropriation act of July 13, 1866:

For clothing for distribution.....	$1,170,000
For commissary stores.....	3,105,250
For medical department.....	500,000
Total.....	$4,775,250

The other appropriations in this act are for salaries, stationery, printing, transportation, schools, &c. (14 United States Statutes-at-Large, 92.)

The "deficiency appropriation act" of March 2, 1867, appropriates $1,500,000 for the same purposes.

Of these appropriations there remain now unexpended, and subject to the control of that patriot and Christian statesman, Major General O. O. Howard, Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, applicable to the relief of destitute refugees and freedmen, $2,100,000.

General Howard, in his letter of March 8, 1867, to the President of the Senate, referring to the amount thus appropriated and subject to his order, says:

"The present appropriation is ample, provided the issues [of rations] be confined to the classes named in the Freedmen's Bureau act."

General Howard further says:

"From official sources, and confirmed by gentlemen from different sections of the South, my estimate is 32,062 whites and 24,238 colored people, making in all 56,300, who will need food from some source before the next crop can relieve them. The number of rations for all per month, 1,707,000. For five months, the probable time required, 8,535,000 rations, at twenty-five cents per ration, the estimated cost, will be $2,133,750. Of this sum, an appropriation has already been made for the five months to the amount of $625,000, leaving an additional sum required of $1,508,750. This sum I deem sufficient to meet the extreme want occasioned by failure of the crop and other causes referred to in the resolution of inquiry."

From these facts it is manifest that provision has been made for full three fourths of all the destitution and suffering in the rebel States by appropriations directly from the national Treasury. The remaining one fourth is confined almost exclusively, though not entirely, to the rebels or those who sympathized with the rebellion.

And now, Mr. Chairman, the question arises as to what should be done for these?

The Senate passed and sent to us Senate joint resolution No. 16, for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States.

The resolution proposed to empower and direct the Secretary of War to issue supplies of food sufficient to prevent starvation and extreme want among all classes of the people in those southern and southwestern States where a failure of the crops and other causes have occasioned wide-spread destitution; the issues to be made through the Freedmen's Bureau, under such regulations as the Secretary of War might prescribe. One million dollars is appropriated for the purpose, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau.

There are now before us, in lieu of and by way of amendment to this, two other propositions. The one offered by my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] proposes simply to direct the officers of the Freedmen's Bureau to expend the $2,100,000 appropriated for the refugees and freedmen for the benefit of all people of all classes, loyal and disloyal, in the rebel States who may be in a destitute condition, thus diverting in part this money from the purpose for which it was appropriated, and taking it in part from the suffering classes for whom it was designed. The other proposition is that offered by my colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK], which authorizes the several district commanders appointed under the act of March 2, 1867, "to provide for a more efficient government for the rebel States."

To assess and collect by military authority, ratable upon all persons within their districts respectively, owning more than one hundred and sixty acres of land, or who shall have an income of more than $600 a year, such sum or sums as such commander may deem necessary to relieve and provide for the destitution and pauperism of the people in his district, not within the provisions of the act concerning abandoned lands, refugees, and freedmen.

And the substitute of my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] further provides—

That to meet the pressing exigencies of the wants of people of his district, the commander of each of said districts may require for, and receive from the Commissary General of Subsistence, such rations of food, from time to time, as he may deem sufficient to meet such exigencies and afford proper relief, to be distributed by him in the manner aforesaid, and said commander shall out of the sums so assessed and collected, as soon as may be, reimburse and pay the subsistence department for all the rations as required by him at the prime cost thereof, with a reasonable amount for transportation of the same.

From these different propositions it will be seen that they both contemplate a provision to relieve the destitution of all the people of the rebel States, disloyal as well as loyal. The question of difference, therefore, is not whether the provision should be made and the relief furnished, but the real question of difference is, whether the whole expense should be charged upon the national Treasury, or whether a small portion of it should be collected from the great rebels whose crimes of treason created the necessity for it.

The Freedmen's Bureau law provides for three fourths of all the destitution and suffering in the rebel States; and now to justify us in charging the national Treasury with the expense of the residue is to assume that the rebel States will add to the crime of treason and rebellion the cruelty and meanness of a refusal to supply the wants of their own rebel poor. Sir, I will not attribute to them this cruelty and meanness, but if they deserve this great reproach it is high time we should compel them to save from starvation and want the small portion of their people not already provided for through the Freedmen's Bureau. For one, sir, I will vote for the substitute offered by my colleague, [Mr. SCHENCK,] but I will not vote for that of my other colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM,] I will not vote for it for several reasons.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the committee rise. There are several bills on the Speaker's table that ought to be acted upon.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move to strike out the first word of the amendment of my colleague, so that I may have an opportunity to complete what I had to say.

I now proceed to state as well as I can in the brief space of time allotted to me some of the reasons why I will not vote for the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

And first, it will leave the provision already made for refugees and freedmen utterly inadequate. It will rob the loyal to supply the disloyal.

General Howard in the letter I have already referred to says:

"The present appropriation [the unexpended $2,100,000] is ample, provided the issues be confined to the classes named in the Freedmen's Bureau act, [refugees and freedmen,] but the additional sum named [of $1,508,750] will be required should the issue be extended as contemplated, [to all the destitute.]

But, sir, I cannot be deceived as to the latent effect, if not the purpose of this scheme. Once inaugurated it will call for more and more appropriations, and they will be made, and thus the Government will assume the stupendous work of providing for all the rebel poor, and the loyal North, the maimed and wounded soldiers of the Union Army who survived the cruelties of the rebellion, will be taxed to pay the expenses.

But I object to this scheme, secondly, because no officer, citizen, legislative or municipal body of the South has asked of Congress any such relief.

I object to this scheme, thirdly, because if appropriations be necessary they should be made by the provisional legislatures in the rebel States, for these can act more efficiently and economically than Congress.

I object fourthly, that it is unjust to tax the people of the loyal States for the support of the rebel poor, while the rebel States are abundantly able to make ample provision for them.

And finally, it is the duty of Congress to avoid unnecessary appropriations and to inaugurate the practice of rigid economy, so as to save the people from oppressive taxation.

I will not enlarge upon these objections at any great length. The bare statement of them, it seems to me, ought to be sufficient.

I do not urge any constitutional objection to these measures. My colleague [Mr. VAN TRUMP] has made an argument on that subject which has great weight so far as the power of Congress is concerned in the appropriation of money for charitable purposes in States with lawfully organized State governments, and where war in fact and in law has ceased.

And this scheme does extend to the State of Tennessee, where peace exists and where a State government also in legal form now is in operation. But as to the remaining ten rebel States, they are without any legal State governments, and are therefore subject to the legislative control of Congress in every respect, so far as may be necessary to organize and guaranty to each a republican form of government.

During this discussion it has been repeatedly said that it is but the dictate of humanity that the wants of the starving poor should be supplied, and that true Christianity forbids that we should stop to inquire whether those who need our aid are loyal or rebel. Sir, I agree to all this. I would not in a great work of humane charity stop to inquire whether the suppliant for bread was my friend or my enemy. In the private relations of life or in acts of statesmanship I would spurn such an idea. But as the custodians of the public Treasury, clothed with the power of deciding who should bear the burdens of relieving those who may be destitute in the South, we should be both just as well as generous.

And now, sir, in view of the facts I have stated, who is there upon this floor that dare go to his constituents and tell them that after having made provision out of the national Treasury for three fourths of all the destitute in the rebel States, without having made any such provision for the loyal States, and without having given the bounties to our soldiers which they so richly deserve and have so earnestly asked in vain—who is there here that dare tell his constituents in the loyal States that he voted to tax them to supply the residue of the destitute of the rebel States while those States were able to make provision from their own resources, and Congress had the power to compel them to do so? For me, sir, I will go to my constituents with no such message.

Sir, I believe no one has ventured to say the rebel States are unable to provide for those whose destitution is not already covered by the charitable aid of the Freedmen's Bureau laws. There is in each one of these rebel States a government, not legally established; I know, as a State government, but recognized as provisional by the sixth section of the recent act of Congress, known as "the military reconstruction act." The Legislature of Mississippi appropriated $20,000 to aid in the defense of that arch traitor, Jeff. Davis, for his great crime of treason to the country. And shall we be now told that this State is unable to aid in relieving the wants of its poor? These provisional governments for two years have been levying and collecting taxes, paying salaries, and keeping in operation all the machinery of government. Why shall we not pay these expenses as well as that which is now asked of us?

In the bill passed only a day or two since, supplementary to "the military reconstruction act," a section was inserted, which I had some humble part in originating, requiring the conventions called in those States to pay the expenses incident to reorganization of their State governments. For two years these States have not only paid the expense of local government, but during the last fiscal year the internal revenue tax on cotton amounted to some twenty million dollars. If these States cannot contribute to the support of their destitute, let us at once cease to levy or collect taxes from them. But this would be so unjust and so unjustifiable that no one has ever asked or advocated exemption from taxation either for local or national purposes.

Mr. Chairman, I congratulate our friends on the other side of this Chamber opposed to the Republican party. It is manifest from the discussions that they will be almost unanimous in supporting the scheme of relieving all the destitute of the South out of the national Treasury, and this although the charity is to be dispensed through the agents of the Freedmen's Bureau.

When the Freedmen's Bureau act was passed, many of the same gentlemen denounced it as unconstitutional and as a grievous charge on the public Treasury. The President's veto met their entire approval.

The act then furnished relief to a starving population, mainly loyal, at a time when as now the rebels would make no provision for the relief of destitute refugees or freedmen in their midst. It was then a necessity dictated by humanity.

But now, when it is proposed to extend the operation of this bureau so as to feed and clothe a large rebel population out of the national Treasury, and thus to relieve the wealthy rebels of the South from burdens which they ought to be compelled to bear, their partisans on this floor are not embarrassed with constitutional scruples, and have become wonderfully charitable and humane, not in the interests of loyalty or loyal men, but in the interests of the new beneficiaries, whose support is to be charged upon the national Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, I would not omit any imperative duty to avoid an increase of the burdens on the national Treasury; but when justice demands that the burdens shall be borne elsewhere, I feel it a duty to practice that justice which relieves the national Treasury. The load of taxes is already sufficiently large. Let us not violate the public confidence and the public sense of right by yielding to unjust demands under the specious guise of philanthropy, which has no element of real benevolence on which to rest.

Mr. PILE. I am opposed to all the amendments and substitutes for the original Senate resolution, and I am opposed to the original resolution itself. I do not intend to make a speech, but simply wish to state the ground of my opposition, and then to indicate a substitute which, if I have the opportunity, I shall offer for the original resolution.

I do not believe in clothing the subject of confiscation with the false guise of taxation. If we intend in good earnest to proceed under the law to confiscate the property of rebels and apply it to the relief of the suffering loyal people of the South, let us put our measures in a plain and direct shape. Let us not disguise confiscation in the deceptive garb of taxation, with the additional objection of spreading through all the southern States the machinery of tax-assessors and tax-collectors in the form of military officers, involving an expense five times as great as the amount originally proposed to be distributed for the purpose of affording the required relief.

I am opposed to appropriating any more money to the Freedmen's Bureau. I have it from General Howard himself that the appropriations already made are ample for the purposes required. I am opposed to conferring upon the Freedmen's Bureau or the Secretary of War authority to grant relief to any man in the South, white or black, loyal or disloyal, who is able to work. If disabled or aged or helpless persons, men, women, or children, should be famishing for bread, and should apply to me for relief, I would grant them food without asking whether they had been loyal or disloyal, whether they had been guilty of crime or had led lives of innocence. Having relieved their immediate distresses and needs, I would then say let them be punished, according to law, for any crime of which they may have been guilty.

These being my views, Mr. Chairman, I shall, if the other amendments and substitutes be voted down, as I hope they will be, offer as a substitute for the original resolution of the Senate the proposition which I hold in my hand. It is in plain language, and will, I think, effectually meet all the requirements of the case. It is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized, through the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, to extend at his discretion the distribution of food and clothing authorized by existing laws to be issued to refugees and freedmen in the late insurrectionary States so as to include all destitute women, children, or helpless persons in said insurrectionary States: Provided, That this extension shall not continue longer than the current year.

This proposition will obviate the objection urged by several gentlemen, that we propose to feed able-bodied rebels, who ought to earn food and clothing by their own labor; while it will extend the required relief to the women and children and helpless persons who are unable to work, and who, as General Howard states, must starve unless speedy assistance be afforded, because they are not able to earn their bread, and because between them and the wealthy ruling classes of the South there is no sympathy, so that the latter will extend them no aid.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. MILLER. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] by adding the following:

That $75,000 thereof be applied by those in charge of the Freedmen's Bureau to purchase seeds through the Agricultural Department to furnish such persons in said late-rebel States with seeds as may need the same to raise provisions for themselves: Provided, That seeds are only to be furnished to such as are not possessed of means to purchase; and their ability to do so is to be determined by those who are to distribute the seeds.

Mr. Chairman, as I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio in its present form, it does not call for any additional appropriation. It appears that some two million one hundred thousand dollars remains at the disposal of the Freedmen's Bureau unexpended. The object of my amendment is that at least seventy-five thousand dollars of this amount shall be expended for the purchase of seeds to enable these needy persons at the South to raise provisions for themselves.

Now, if these seeds are furnished with proper judgment it will be a great blessing to that section of country. I understand that applications are daily made for seed from these States to the Agricultural Department, and from the large number of letters received by the Commissioner it is evident that unless some additional appropriation be made it will be impossible to furnish seed to the loyal northern States, and also to those lately in rebellion.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the gentleman whether the gardens in the South have not already been planted?

Mr. MILLER. I will say, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] that he must recollect that there is a material difference between his State and that of the southern States, sometimes denominated the sunny South. In the former gardens are made but once in a year, while in the latter planting continues the greater part of the year, so that as one crop is maturing another is being planted, and of course it requires seed to enable them to plant; and surely the honorable gentleman is in favor of encouraging industry even with those who took part in the rebellion.

I understand from gentlemen who come from the South that in many places the crops have been almost entirely destroyed, and of course when they again undertake to cultivate their land they will require this seed. If my colleague's bill be passed, and the land is divided up into small farms, this seed will most certainly be necessary. I do not think this money can be better applied than for this purpose. It will only be for this and the coming season.

Now, sir, I do not see how there can be any objection to this proposition. It will enable these persons who are destitute to raise in a short time sufficient food for themselves and families. I take no objection to the gentleman's amendment. I think I am justifiable, from the report of General Howard, in saying that these southern people are in a state of starvation and that we ought to feed them. It ought not to be limited to women and children and old men. If the men down there cannot get work and are starving, I think we ought to feed them without regard to their age until they can procure employment and no longer.

I will add that I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

Mr. PILE. Let me ask the gentleman whether it is not a fact that there is abundant testimony of the great scarcity of labor all over the South, that more labor is needed and required than can be supplied, and that every man who is able to work can and ought to support himself, and if he will not, he ought to starve?

Mr. MILLER. I know that is the report, but whether it is true or not I cannot say. If these men cannot get work they ought not to be allowed to starve, and the way to give them employment is to furnish seeds and encourage the tilling of the soil, and in a short time they will have food sufficient for their support and to spare; and I will add, Mr. Chairman, that I have every confidence in those having charge of the distribution of provisions; that it will not be furnished to those who are not destitute and in great danger of starvation.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I think my colleague had better add a small appropriation to send down gardeners to do the work for them. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri. I wish to call attention to the fact that the original Freedmen's Bureau bill, to which this whole appropriation will be referred, controls and governs as to the parties who are to be affected. I will read the proviso showing who will be entitled to this bounty if this appropriation should pass. It shows that all those who can support themselves will not get a single dollar of this money.

Mr. BINGHAM. Everyone ought to know that, and I am glad the gentleman has referred to it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. The proviso to which I refer is as follows:

Provided, That no person shall be deemed "destitute," "suffering," or "dependent upon the Government for support," within the meaning of this act, who is able to find employment, and could by proper industry or exertion avoid such destitution, suffering, or dependence.

The question was taken on Mr. MILLER's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on Mr. BINGHAM's amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to insert "of helpless or disabled," so that it will read "all classes of helpless or disabled persons." As it now reads it is to be given to all classes of persons. They may have as much property as they please elsewhere, but if they happen to be in temporary want they are to be supplied with all these things.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is not an amendment to my amendment, but to the original text.

Mr. PILE. I hope all these amendments will be voted down, so that we may get to the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is not now in order.

Mr. BINGHAM's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I now move my amendment, to insert after the word "classes" the words, "of disabled or helpless persons." It will confine the issue of these supplies to helpless or disabled persons.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is it the object of the gentleman to supply those who are disabled from having performed military service in aid of the rebellion?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is well understood, I suppose, that I am not at all in favor of this joint resolution; but if it is to pass, I want to have it put into as good shape as possible. At least let the benefits of the measure be confined to the needy, helpless, and disabled, and not extended also to the sturdy and strong.

Mr. BINGHAM. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.] It must be apparent to members here that if his amendment be adopted, an able-bodied freedman who may be starving for food, could not receive assistance under this joint resolution. We here know the fact, and the country knows the fact, that millions of acres of land have been devastated by the recent floods in the valley of the Tennessee. The report has come officially to your Freedmen's Bureau that the inhabitants of that district, of all classes, without distinction, are famishing for bread. Their houses are filled with the waters; their lands are covered with the waters; the products of their land have been swept away by the floods; and yet the gentleman stands up here and says that because the people may own lands that are inundated by water, and are able-bodied, therefore they must be left to starve.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me to say—

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; I hope his proposition will be voted down.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will my colleague—

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir, not now. And I desire to say further that by the terms of the original law controlling the regulations of the Secretary of War he can only supply the famishing with food. They may be able-bodied and still be famishing. Can you not trust your Secretary of War, as you have trusted him heretofore? Cannot you trust your Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, as you have already trusted him with $12,000,000? Who ever heard of either of them furnishing food to able-bodied men who had the means to obtain a subsistence for themselves? It is a reflection upon their integrity; and for their sake, if for nothing else, I hope the committee will vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois by striking out the words "disabled or" and inserting the words "destitute and;" so that that portion will read: "all classes of destitute and helpless persons."

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the gentleman will take out the word "and" and put in the word "or."

Mr. BROOMALL. I think it is better as it is.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] and modify my amendment accordingly.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then a person must be both helpless and destitute to be entitled to receive assistance.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] says it is the duty of the Government to aid and feed able-bodied men who own acres of land if it should happen to be covered with water just now. Now, I wish to say to him that any man in the valley of the Mississippi who owns a plantation, even though it may be covered with water, can procure food before he is able to raise it on his plantation. I want to know of him if he considers it the duty of the Government to supply bread to men who own land, and who can obtain bread by selling their land, and by their own labor? Have we arrived to that point that no matter how broad a man's acres may be, how well able he may be to labor, yet if he happens by some untoward circumstance to be for the present deprived of bread, he shall not be called upon to dispose of any of his land for bread, or to earn it by his own labor, but he may come to the Treasury of the United States to get means to obtain it?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. With the permission of the gentleman, I will say that three of my constituents went down there with several thousand dollars to purchase land, and every one of them was robbed and murdered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. All over the country there are people who have land, but no bread. All over the country there are men who have stout and healthy bodies who have no bread. They, however, obtain bread by the sweat of their faces or by selling some of their land for it. And while a man has strong arms to labor with or an acre of land to sell it is his duty to earn or buy his bread for himself, and not come to the Government of the United States as a beggar and ask for it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] by striking out "and" and inserting "or;" so that it will read "all classes of destitute or helpless persons."

Mr. FARNSWORTH and others. Oh, no! Mr. BINGHAM. Gentlemen may say "Oh, no," but I say "Oh, yes." I ask the gentleman to accept it.

Mr. BROOMALL. I think my amendment means precisely that now. But I have no control over it myself and cannot now modify it, because it has been accepted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] as a part of his amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "and" and inserting "or." And I beg leave to say that if it means the same thing as the other no one can well object to the change I propose. If it does not mean the same thing, then I submit that the difference is just this: that before relief can be extended to a person he must not only be destitute, but also helpless, physically helpless. If it means just the same thing, then I ask gentlemen why they object to striking out the word "and" and inserting the word "or?" For if you substitute the word "or" for the word "and," then if they be destitute they can be helped, or if they be helpless they can be helped. That is all there is of it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not suppose the gentleman means to say that if a person is helpless but not destitute the bureau should assist him?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; but I mean to say this: a person may be helpless away from home and yet not be destitute, or not without means of support when at home; or he may be without food and yet not be physically helpless. He may have been stricken with paralysis, or smitten with blindness, amidst the terrible calamities which have swept over this country.

Mr. BUTLER. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] and in order to demonstrate my position, I will ask the Clerk to read as a part of my remarks the plan of the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

Extract from Diary of Rebellion Record, volume six, page 28, December 15, 1862.

"Governor Johnson, of Tennessee, this day issued an order assessing certain individuals in the city of Nashville, in various amounts, to be paid in five monthly installments, in behalf of the many helpless widows, wives, and children in the city of Nashville who have been reduced to poverty and wretchedness in consequence of their husbands, sons, and fathers having been forced into the armies of this unholy and nefarious rebellion."

"About the same time [latter part of 1862] Governor Johnson published an order assessing the wealthy secessionists of Nashville and the vicinity to the amount of $60,000 for the support of the poor during the winter."

Mr. SCHENCK. That is the plan embraced in my substitute.

Mr. BUTLER. Now I ask how my friend from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] who has got over on the other side not only in body, but in spirit, [laughter,] can afford to go against the policy of the President, to which I call his attention? There it is; that is the example set us by that "great and good man" when he had the power and the inclination. He taxed the rich secessionist in order to feed the wives and children of the poor men who had been forced into this "nefarious rebellion." Now, I want to do the same thing: nothing more and nothing less.

Now, before I sit down, I want to make another suggestion to our friends on the other side, because I know what weighs on their minds. I would ask them how they can vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] recognizing, as it does, that abomination of abominations, the "negro bureau," which they have always opposed?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was upon the motion of Mr. BINGHAM to amend the amendment of Mr. FARNSWORTH by striking out "and" and inserting "or;" so that it will read "all classes of destitute or helpless people."

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I desire to give notice that when the proper time shall have arrived I will move to amend by adding the following:

Provided, That no person shall be deemed within the benefits of this act whose helplessness is owing to injuries received in the military service of the rebellion.

The question was taken upon Mr. BINGHAM's amendment to the amendment of Mr. FARNSWORTH; and upon a division, there were—ayes 59, noes 39.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. FARNSWORTH called for tellers on the amendment to the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FARNSWORTH and Mr. BINGHAM were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes seventy-seven, noes not counted.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that it does not become a gentleman who recorded his vote fifty times for Jefferson Davis, the arch-traitor in this rebellion, as his candidate for President of the United States, to undertake to damage this cause by attempting to cast an imputation either upon my integrity or my honor. I repel with scorn and contempt any utterance of that sort from any man, whether he be the hero of Fort Fisher not taken or of Fort Fisher taken. [Laughter.] I stand here also in the name of the American people to repel with scorn the attempt to levy charity by confiscation, in violation of the Constitution of my country. That, sir, is the proposition which the gentleman dares to offer in an American Congress in the sacred name of charity. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. All debate by order of the House is exhausted.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the Chair to state a while ago that all debate would close at fifteen minutes past three o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that the hour to which debate had been limited would expire at eighteen minutes after three o'clock.

Mr. BUTLER. So that the gentleman from Ohio had just enough time to make a personal attack upon me.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the privilege of replying to the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can ask the privilege of the House, but not of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask it of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is not competent to grant the privilege.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope that by unanimous consent the committee will grant the gentleman the privilege. This is a subject which I should be glad to have ventilated.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee must rise for that purpose. The Chairman is acting under the express order of the House, that all debate be limited to one hour.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the committee rise.

On the motion there were—ayes 45, noes 58. Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FARNSWORTH and BINGHAM were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 62.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAINE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly Senate joint resolution No. 16, for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had indefinitely postponed a joint resolution and a bill of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) to extend to the employes in the first division of the National Currency Bureau, Treasury Department, the provisions of the joint resolution approved February 28, 1867, giving additional compensation to certain employes in the civil service at Washington; and

An act (H. R. No. 73) to exempt ladders from internal tax.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed an act (H. R. No. 72) to exempt wrapping-paper made from wood or corn-stalks from internal tax, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

RELIEF OF DESTITUTE IN THE SOUTH—AGAIN.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I propose to move to reconsider the vote restricting debate in Committee of the Whole on this bill; but before making that motion I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who desires an opportunity to reply to the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. It will require unanimous consent for the gentleman from Massachusetts to make his remarks at this time, as the bill is not before the House, but in Committee of the Whole. If the gentleman will indicate how much time he desires, the Chair will ask unanimous consent for him to proceed now.

Mr. BUTLER. Ten minutes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the House will grant unanimous consent, and not permit the gentleman from Massachusetts to be "bottled up" in this manner. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. If no gentleman objects, the Chair will understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts has unanimous consent to speak for ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I am under infinite obligations to the House for its kindness in my behalf; and I will endeavor to avoid trespassing unduly upon its time.

I have never concealed, Mr. Speaker, the fact which is now so offensively put forward, that before the war I, in the convention of my party, voted fifty-seven times for Jefferson Davis for President. I thought him the representative man of the South, and I hoped by his nomination to prevent threatened disunion. I was foiled, and disunion came. The difference between me and the honorable gentleman from Ohio is this: while Jefferson Davis was in the Union, a Senator of the United States, and claiming to be a friend of the Union I supported him; but he now supports him when he is a traitor. [Laughter.] I left him as soon as he left the Union. [Renewed laughter.] I saw the error of my ways and repented; but I did not expect that a blow would be made against me from that direction, from the side of the House that supported him then and have supported him ever since, and are still supporting him and his friends.

I did not mean to impugn the honor of the gentleman from Ohio or his integrity. I only said that I thought he was on the other side of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman pardon me. If the gentleman had qualified his remark by saying that he only thought so, I would not have said a word in reply. The gentleman did not qualify his words by any such expression.

Mr. BUTLER. The words I used, if I am not mistaken, were these: that he was in spirit, as he was in body, on the other side of the House. I thought so then, I think so now; I said so then, I say so now, [laughter,] and I cannot take it back.

The gentleman has the bad taste to attack me for the reason that I could not do any more injury to the enemies of my country. I agree to that. I did all I could, the best I could. Other men of more ability could do more; and no man is more ready to give them the highest plaudits for valor and discretion and conduct than I am. And because I could not do more I feel exceedingly chagrined; but if during the war the gentleman from Ohio did as much as I did in that direction I shall be glad to recognize that much done. But the only victim of the gentleman's prowess that I know of was an innocent woman hung upon the scaffold, one Mrs. Surratt. And I can sustain the memory of Fort Fisher if he and his present associates can sustain him in shedding the blood of a woman tried by a military commission and convicted without sufficient evidence in my judgment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a remark or two, and I hope I will have the consent of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. How long does the gentleman want?

Mr. BINGHAM. Five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, although I have seen ten years of service in the Congress of the United States, the gentleman will look in vain for one remark of mine personal to any man upon this floor save when I replied to gratuitous assaults upon me; and I beg leave to add, scarcely a word of mine can be found in the proceedings of this House which can be construed into unkindness toward a fellow-member. I have observed the amenities of debate in the House and the amenities of personal conduct out of the House in such measure as I trust entitles me to the respect and consideration of those who know me best. Sir, the gentleman talks about matters of taste in which he is doubtless a master, and as a matter of taste constitutes himself my judge and undertakes to decide upon the integrity of my conduct as a sworn Representative of the people. I respectfully challenge the gentleman's fitness to be my accuser and deny his right to judge of my official conduct. When I had thus answered the gentleman's gratuitous assertion that I had abandoned and betrayed my principles, feeling that he had done dishonor to himself and injustice to me, he vainly seeks to qualify his rude assertion by saying that he only said he thought so. Sir, if he had said that he only thought or feared that I had abandoned principle because I ventured to differ from him, it would never have disturbed my equanimity and would have elicited no reply from me. Indeed, sir, what the gentleman thought about my official action would have given me no more concern than it would concern me to know what his thoughts are upon the question "who killed Cock Robin." [Laughter.]

But, sir, the gentleman has shown the same want of consideration for the rights of others in the remarks he has just made by the favor of this House as was shown by him when this day he first assailed my official action without excuse or provocation. By what right, sir, does the gentleman now constitute himself the judge, not only of his peer upon this floor, but the judge of men who were his peers in the field, men who stood in the day of battle only where brave men dare stand, in the thick darkness of the great conflict where the earthquake and the fire led the charge, and the victory was won not without suffering and death?

The gentleman denounces me as having executed an innocent person without evidence. I have executed no person, but acted as the advocate of the United States on the trial of persons who were charged with and convicted of the assassination of Abraham Lincoln. The gentleman pronounces, with the assurance of Sir Oracle, that an innocent woman was on that trial convicted without sufficient evidence. By what right does the gentleman thus assail me, or the tribunal of true and brave and honorable men who found the facts upon their oaths and pronounced the judgment? What does the gentleman know of the evidence in the case, and what does he care for evidence when he thus assails the official conduct of the men who constituted the court?

Does the gentleman hope to condemn me for the judgment that was pronounced by the brave men who were constituted by the order of your President a court to hear and determine that issue of life and death upon their oaths according to the evidence? He cannot, sir, condemn me for the act of others, whatever he may endeavor. Malice itself, sir, cannot hold me to answer for the judgment of others. It is due to justice to say that the judgment of that honorable court is not without testimony to sustain it. Sir, I leave this accusation by saying to the gentleman, in the words of a man who, though pronounced by a cynical poet—was a man, the latchet of whose shoes the gentleman would be unfit to unloose, that it is the duty of a "good judge to hear patiently." The gentleman constitutes himself my judge without right, and pronounces judgment against me without a hearing.

"The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind,"

As the gentleman thus seeks to condemn me unheard and without warrant of law or color of justice in his high position as a statesman, I would remind him of another utterance of the Lord High Chancellor of England, that "Statesmen of greatest depths and compass have been touched with an inward sense and knowledge of Deity."

Let those who have witnessed the gentleman's bearing in this controversy toward me, and who have heard his rude and unwarranted judgment upon my official conduct here and elsewhere, decide whether he has exhibited the character of a good judge, a great statesman, or a gross calumniator. Whether in the discharge of the delicate trust committed to me on the trial of those convicted of assassination I condemned and executed the innocent, or even the guilty, with or without evidence, I leave to the charitable speeches and just judgment of men and the recorded facts of history.

While I offer no apology for my official conduct on that trial, I beg leave to say that it was fit that the assassination of the chosen of the people, in the capital of the people and in the felt presence of their laws, not for his crimes but for his virtues, should be investigated, and that swift judgment should fall upon those guilty of his murder, and who would not spare his life, even at the moment when from his great soul the words went up to our common Father: "Charity toward all and malice toward none." When summoned to that stern duty I protested that I was not equal to the task, and those who summoned me to its discharge know best with what reluctance I entered upon it. But, sir, upon the record that has been made I stand and defy the gentleman's calumny.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House adjourn. We have had enough for the present.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on the Rules desire to report to-day, and have been waiting to do so.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw the motion for the present.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR.

Mr. BANKS. The Committee on the Rules, to whom was referred the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] for the appointment of a standing committee on labor, respectfully report that as the recent establishment of a Department of Education seems to render necessary the organization of a committee on that subject, they propose the adoption of the following rule, upon which I call the previous question:

RULE.—There shall be appointed at each Congress a Committee on Education and Labor, to consist of nine members, to whom shall be referred all petitions, bills, reports, and resolutions on those subjects, and who shall from time to time report thereon.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the rule was adopted.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the rule was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an account of receipts and expenditures for the service of the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1866; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN TREATIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an estimate of appropriations necessary to fulfill treaty stipulations with the Chippewa Indians west of the Mississippi; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MILEAGE.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, submitted a report from the Committee on the Judiciary on the Speaker's inquiry as to the mileage due to members of the Fortieth Congress. The conclusion of the report was read as follows:

The committee, therefore, conclude that members of the present Congress who were members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress are not entitled to receive any payment on account of mileage until the first day of the session commencing on the first Monday of December, 1867.

The report was agreed to; and, on motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, it was ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 15) suspending all proceedings in relation to payment for slaves drafted or received as volunteers in the military service of the United States.

PROPERTY LOST IN MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred Senate joint resolution No. 22, declaring the meaning of the second section of the act of March 2, 1861, relative to property lost in the military service.

No objection was made.

The joint resolution was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes, p. m.) I now renew my motion that the House adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 45, noes 69.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, said: I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn: we have been here long enough for one day.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes seventeen; not one fifth of the last vote.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. FARNSWORTH called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FARNSWORTH and Mr. AMES were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were twenty-six in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one fifth of the vote last taken) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 49, nays 85, not voting 80, as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

RELIEF OF DESTITUTE IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole upon Senate joint resolution No. 16. I will state that all I desire is to have the consideration of that joint resolution concluded in Committee of the Whole and have it reported to the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Before that question is voted upon I move to reconsider the vote by which debate upon this joint resolution was terminated in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes seventy-four, noes not counted.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. BINGHAM, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole upon Senate joint resolution No. 16.

Mr. BINGHAM. All I desire is to have the joint resolution acted upon in the committee and reported to the House, so that we may have a vote upon it to-morrow.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I call for the yeas and nays upon the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 58, not voting 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Archer, Baker, Banks, Barnes, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Burr, Chanler, Churchill, Culiom, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eldridge, Ferry, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Dodge, Eckley, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Finney, Gravelly, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Moore, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, Noell, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Upson, Van Wyck, Cadwalader, C. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Windom—58.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Benjamin, Boutwell, Bromwell, Cornell, Davies, Denison, Ela, Eliot, Garfield, Griswold, Harding, Hopkins, Kelley, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, McCullough, Moorhead, Morgan, Phelps, Pike, Pomerooy, Price, Raum, Selye, Stone, and William B. Washburn—29.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLAINE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 16, for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States.

The pending question was upon the following amendment, offered by Mr. FARNSWORTH:

In line three, after the word "classes" insert the words "of destitute or helpless persons."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the substitute offered by Mr. SCHENCK for the following, offered by Mr. BUTLER:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and substitute as follows:

That the sum of $1,000,000 be appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in relieving the widows and children of Union soldiers starved to death in the rebel prisons of Andersonville, Salisbury, Libby, Millen, and Belle Isle.

The substitute of Mr. SCHENCK was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert: That the several district commanders of the military districts defined by an act entitled "An act to provide for a more efficient government for the rebel States," approved March 2, 1867, shall have power to assess and collect by military authority, ratably upon all persons within their districts, respectively, owning more than one hundred and sixty acres of land, or who shall have an income of more than six hundred dollars a year, such sum or sums as such commander may deem necessary to relieve and provide for the destitution and pauperism of the people in his district not within the provisions of the act concerning abandoned lands, refugees, and freedmen: Provided, That all moneys raised by such assessments shall be applied to the purposes of such relief, and no other.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That for the purpose of collecting such assessments, such commanders shall severally have, in addition to their military authority, the same powers and authority to levy and collect, by sale or otherwise, such assessments as were vested by law in the tax commissioners, under an act entitled "An act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary States, and for other purposes," passed June 7, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof, so far as the same may be applicable; which power of levy, collection, and sale may be exercised by said district commanders severally, either in person or by a commission duly appointed by each of said military commanders, and all acts and proceedings in such assessment, levy, and collection shall be as valid, to all intents and purposes, as if done and carried on under and by virtue of the provisions of said last mentioned act.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That the sums so raised by assessment shall be distributed and applied for relief as aforesaid by the several district commanders, respectively, either by such officers or military commissions as they may detail, or through the agents of the Bureau of Abandoned Lands, Refugees, and Freedmen of their several districts, at his election, who shall be the agents of said district commander for this purpose; and said district commander shall cause a full, true, accurate, and explicit account to be kept, and return to be made of his receipts and expenditures, and of his doings under and by virtue of this act, to the Secretary of War, who shall audit and adjust such accounts in the same manner as the accounts of other disbursing officers of the War Department are audited and adjusted.

SEC. 4. And be it further resolved, That to meet the pressing exigencies of the wants of people of his district, the commander of each of said districts may require for and receive from the Commissary General of Subsistence such rations of food, from time to time, as he may deem sufficient to meet such exigencies and afford proper relief, to be distributed by him in the manner aforesaid; and said commander shall, out of the sums so assessed and collected, as soon as may be, reimburse and pay the subsistence department for all rations so required by him at the prime cost thereof, with a reasonable amount for transportation of the same: Provided, however, That no relief shall be given or afforded to any able-bodied unmarried man, or to any family wherein an able-bodied inmate is residing, who is not continuously employed in some manual labor during the time of giving such relief.

The question being taken on agreeing to the substitute of Mr. SCHENCK, it was declared not agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SCHENCK and BOYER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 49, noes 68.

So the substitute of Mr. SCHENCK was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. BUTLER, to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

That the sum of $1,000,000 be appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in relieving the widows and children of Union soldiers starved to death in the rebel prisons of Andersonville, Salisbury, Libby, Millen, and Belle Isle.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was declared not agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUTLER and HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 68.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PILE. I now offer the following substitute:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized, through the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, to extend at his discretion the distribution of food and clothing authorized by existing laws to be issued to refugees and freedmen in the late insurrectionary States so as to include all destitute women, children, and helpless persons in the said insurrectionary States.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the reading of the resolution as already amended by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, empowered and directed to issue supplies of food sufficient to prevent starvation and extreme want among all classes of destitute or helpless persons in those southern and southwestern States where a failure of the crops and other causes have occasioned wide-spread destitution; that the issues be made through the Freedmen's Bureau, under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to that end the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed through the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau to apply so much as he may deem necessary for the purposes aforesaid of the unexpended moneys heretofore appropriated to supply freedmen and refugees with provisions or rations.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend the text of the resolution by inserting after "southern and southwestern States" the words "and all other parts of the United States;" so that this relief may not be confined to any particular section of the country, but may be extended wherever destitution exists.

On the amendment of Mr. FARNSWORTH there were—ayes 40, noes 60.

Mr. FARNSWORTH called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FARNSWORTH and BINGHAM were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 44, noes 66.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I renew my amendment, as follows:

Provided, No person shall be deemed within the benefits of this act whose helplessness is owing to injuries received in the military service of the rebellion.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 39.

Mr. SHELLABARGER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SHELLABARGER and Mr. NIBLACK were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 41, noes 69.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move the following as additional sections:

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That for the purpose of reimbursing the Government for the moneys expended under this act, the several district commanders for the military districts defined by an act entitled "An act to provide for a more efficient government for the rebel States," approved March 2, 1867, shall have power to assess and collect by military authority, ratably upon all persons within their districts, respectively, owning more than one hundred and sixty acres of land, or who shall have an income of more than $600 a year, such sum or sums as such commander may deem necessary to relieve and provide for the destitution and pauperism of the people in his district not within the provisions of the act concerning abandoned lands, refugees, and freedmen.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That for the purpose of collecting such assessments, such commanders shall severally have, in addition to their military authority, the same powers and authority to levy and collect, by sale or otherwise, such assessments as were vested by law in the tax commissioners, under an act entitled "An act for the collection of direct taxes in insurrectionary States, and for other purposes," passed June 7, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof, so far as the same may be applicable; which power of levy, collection, and sale may be exercised by said district commanders severally, either in person or by a commission duly appointed by each of said military commanders, and all acts and proceedings in such assessment, levy, and collection shall be as valid, to all intents and purposes, as if done and carried on under and by virtue of the provisions of said last mentioned act.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 61.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of War shall not extend the expenditure beyond the appropriations already made for the Freedmen's Bureau for the current year.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 58.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LOGAN and Mr. ARCHER were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 64.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to insert after the words "insurrectionary States" these words, "except Tennessee." I do not want to put her in such bad company. She is reconstructed, and has her own government.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on Mr. PILE's substitute, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized, through the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, to extend at his discretion the distribution of food and clothing authorized by existing laws to be issued to refugees and freedmen in the late insurrectionary States, so as to include all destitute women, children, and helpless persons in the said insurrectionary States."

Mr. PILE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PILE and Mr. PETERS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 65.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to add to the original resolution the following:

Provided, That the expenditure shall not extend beyond the appropriations already made for the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is already in the bill.

Mr. LOGAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BROOKS and Mr. JUDN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the committee rise and report the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAINE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, according to order, had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly Senate joint resolution No. 16, for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with several amendments.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. ALLISON (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes) moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the previous question is seconded; I am willing to allow it to go over till to-morrow.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I insist on the motion to adjourn.

The House refused to adjourn—ayes 44, noes 63.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I now move to adjourn, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understood the gentleman from Ohio to say that he would allow the matter to go over till to-morrow. A good many gentlemen have gone home.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman is aware that my own friends object.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. I think there is an agreement on our side of the House, as the previous question is seconded, not to adjourn.

Mr. PAINE. What does the gentleman mean by "our side of the House?"

Mr. BLAINE. I mean the side in favor of feeding the starving.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 64, nays 65, not voting 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Baldwin, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Broomall, Butler, Calk, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Finney, Gravely, Hooper, Hopkins, Hunter, Judd, Ladin, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Newcomb, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pile, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, Upson, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Wood—64.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Baker, Banks, Barnes, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Burr, Chanler, Coburn, Donnelly, Eldridge, Ferry, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hill, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Humphrey, Julian, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Lincoln, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Poland, Polsley, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stewart, Taber, Taffe, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, and Woodbridge—65.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Beaman, Benjamin, Boutwell, Bromwell, Brooks, Cornell, Dawes, Denison, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Garfield, Griswold, Harding, Ingersoll, Kelley, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, McCullough, Moorhead, Morgan, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Selye, Stone, William B. Washburn, John T. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—35.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, if the House adjourns, by common consent cannot the vote be taken on this resolution to-morrow at one o'clock without delay?

The SPEAKER. If the House adjourns with this resolution pending as it is now, with the two amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole, it will come up the first thing after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning, under the operation of the previous question, and it cannot be debated.

Mr. BINGHAM. What I desire is, to get a vote on the resolution; and if the House is ready to vote upon it to-morrow without any dilatory motion, with that view I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I believe that motion is not in order, no business having intervened since the vote just taken on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that when the House adjourn it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first count the House, as the call is not in order under the operation of the previous question unless upon a count a quorum is found not to be in attendance. Does the gentleman state that there is not a quorum present?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not state that.

Mr. ALLISON. I insist on my motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. Has the main question been ordered upon this joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order. The pending motion, which was made as the Chair understands in order to have some business transacted before another motion to adjourn can be made, is the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] that when the House adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Saturday next.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. ALLISON, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—yeas 68, nays 44.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. BINGHAM called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 30, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Baker, Baldwin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Boyer, Broomall, Butler, Calk, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Ela, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Getz, Glossbrenner, Halsey, Hamilton, Hill, Hopkins, Hulburt, Humphrey, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Morrell, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pile, Poland, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taber, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and John T. Wilson—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Buckland, Burr, Donnelly, Ferry, Gravely, Haight, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Koontz, Mungen, Myers, Noell, Polsley, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Spalding, Stewart, Taffe, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Windom, and Woodbridge—30.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barnes, Beaman, Benjamin, Blaine, Bromwell, Brooks, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Denison, Eggleston, Eliot, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Griswold, Harding, Hayes, Hooper, Ingersoll, Kelley, Kelsey, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, Marshall, McCullough, Moore, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrissey, Orth, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Selye, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stone, Taylor, Thomas, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wood—52.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 22, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY.

On motion of Mr. STEWART, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions adopted at a public meeting of soldiers and sailors held in Washington city on the 18th instant, in favor of the passage of a just and equitable bounty law, and increasing the pay of employes of the Government, and the employment of none but soldiers or sailors upon the Capitol police force, and the establishment of a Bureau of Education; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FERRY presented the petition of H. Bingham and others, citizens of Connecticut, praying Congress to take the necessary steps to carry into effect the laws of the United States which are now set at naught in the Territory of Utah, and particularly to protect citizens of the United States without distinction of race, occupation, or religion in the enjoyment of their rights as citizens in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. COLE presented a petition of citizens of California, praying for a reorganization of the United States district court for the southern district of California; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the petition of A. B. Davis, President of the Union Plank or Turnpike Road Company, praying for the passage of a law purchasing out the roadway and franchises of the Washington and Rockville turnpike, and taking the same under the authority of the United States or transferring the roadway and franchises to the Union Plank or Turnpike Road Company; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. RAMSEY presented resolutions of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from the head of Lake Superior to the Pacific ocean, and also the construction of a railroad from the falls of St. Anthony to a point of junction with the Northern Pacific railroad on the Red River of the North; which were referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the establishment of a mail route from New Auburn to New Ulm, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the improvement of the Mississippi river, commencing near the mouth of the Minnesota river, to the falls of St. Anthony; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORTON presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of a grant of lands to aid in the construction of the Sioux City and St. Paul railroad of the State of Iowa, the Minnesota Valley railroad of Minnesota, and the Lake Superior and Mississippi railroad of Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Owatonna and State Line railway; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of a tri-weekly mail line from Carver to Glencoe, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

RICHARD BUSTEED, JUNIOR.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Richard Busteed, jr., to report a bill for his relief, and I am further authorized by the committee, in consideration of the peculiar circumstances of this case, to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 99) for the relief of Richard Busteed, jr., was read twice by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be paid to Richard Busteed, jr., late captain battery C, Chicago light artillery, the sum of $1,247 66, being the pension of a captain from the 7th day of November, 1861, the date of his honorable discharge from the service, until the 30th day of January, 1867, the date from which a pension has been granted to him.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I should like to state that the petitioner in this case was in the early part of the war shattered considerably by the recoil of a piece of ordnance, and in that situation he became afflicted with rheumatism, and that has progressed to such an extent that he is utterly and entirely helpless. He cannot stand on his feet or move in bed without the assistance of several persons. He requires four or five attendants daily. He has spent all the money he had, to the amount of $7,000, and is entitled, as the committee think, to this relief. Having asked at such a time as this that a private bill should be taken up for consideration, I feel bound to make this statement. The man is utterly helpless. He may not live until another session. He has spent all his own means and incurred debts, and his mind is troubled on that point. He cannot move, according to the testimony of the younger General Howard, without the assistance of three or four persons. It is at the instance and particular request of the general that I have brought this bill forward at this time, and I trust it will pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND ADJOINING BROOKLYN NAVY-YARD.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 41) for the purchase of land adjoining the navy-yard at Brooklyn; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask that the resolution be read at length.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to complete the purchase of the property adjoining the New York navy-yard, known as the Ruggles property, without the previous assent of the State of New York: Provided, The title is otherwise approved by the Attorney General.

Mr. ANTHONY. This resolution has met the approval of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the Department is very anxious that it should pass. It merely provides for the purchase of some property adjoining the navy-yard at Brooklyn without the previous assent of the Legislature of New York, which is required by a general law. The property has been bargained for; the money has been appropriated, and is now in the Treasury; and some other parties who are desirous to get possession of it, I believe, have had the address to prevent the Legislature from giving its assent except upon conditions that will not be acceptable to the Government; and the Department is quite willing to take it without the assent. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. Let the resolution be read again.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. SHERMAN. There seems to be no limit as to the price.

Mr. ANTHONY. The appropriation is already made; the land has been bought; and they have only been waiting for this assent.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to have the resolution lie over for a few moments, before being acted upon finally, until I can make some inquiry on the subject. What was the original law authorizing this purchase? Did that require the assent of the State of New York?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a general law that requires the assent of the Legislature of the State to any purchase in a State made by the Government, a law passed in 1841. This purchase was made under the authority of an appropriation bill for $90,000. The money was appropriated and is now in the Treasury; the land has been bargained for, and the parties are prepared to transfer it; but I believe the gas company in Brooklyn desire to obtain a portion of the same land, and are endeavoring to get the Legislature to refuse its assent unless the Government will consent to a transfer of some of its territory, which the Department think would be injurious. The Department is quite willing to accept the land without the assent of the Legislature. It is not against the consent of the Legislature, but without its being formally given under the law of 1841.

Mr. RAMSEY. If this matter is to pass over, I should like to present some resolutions.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not object to it.

The joint resolution was passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 20) to pay bounty to certain Missouri troops who served for three years during the late war, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the Senate having acted on a House bill on the same subject; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 12) fixing the pay of the clerks at the Springfield armory, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, legislation having been had on the subject; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 25) providing for the importation into the United States of certain works of art duty free, have had it under consideration, and have instructed me to report a bill of two sections covering this object, and also the object of another joint resolution which was under consideration yesterday, to remit or refund duties on agricultural machinery imported into the United States as models, as a substitute for the joint resolution; and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over under the rule.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations have directed me to report a bill, and to ask for its immediate consideration. It is a bill similar to the one on which the Senate acted last evening on the motion of the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS.]

The bill (S. No. 100) supplementary to an act for the relief of Hiram Paulding, rear admiral United States Navy, was read and passed to a second reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks for the present consideration of this bill. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I object.

Mr. SUMNER. It is reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I dare say.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator can have no objection to it. It is merely to correct an error.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over under the rules.

Mr. CORBETT. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 27) to authorize the leasing of certain real estate in San Francisco, to report it with an amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 83) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I now ask the Senate to take up the little bill that I reported a few minutes ago. It is a bill to correct a mistake in an act passed during the last days of the last session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I understand that to be objected to.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Maine, I take it, does not object now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is a violent presumption. I am inclined to think I shall object. I sat here all day yesterday to observe the rules of the Senate, with a view of presenting some bills and reports, and was unable to do it, and I made up my mind that I would ask to have the rules enforced to give us all a fair chance.

Mr. SUMNER. Will not the Senator allow an error to be corrected?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the honorable Senator will allow me to introduce a bill and joint resolution, I shall withdraw my objection.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 22) to authorize the payment of Rev. C. B. BORNTRON, as Chaplain of the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the New England Emigrant Aid Company, praying to be indemnified for the destruction of property at Lawrence, in Kansas Territory, in 1856, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 86) extending to the State of Nebraska the provisions of an act relating to agricultural colleges, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 101) to divide California into two judicial districts; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 102) providing for the formation of corporations and regulating the same in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 103) to conform the rules of practice and pleading in the courts of the United States to the laws of the respective States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 104) to authorize the formation of corporations for manufacturing, mining, mechanical, or chemical purposes in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 42) for the relief of certain officers of volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Mr. WILSON. I submit the following resolution, and ask that it be laid upon the table and printed:

A concurrent resolution respecting Jefferson Davis.

Whereas Jefferson Davis, a citizen of the State of Mississippi, was captured by a military force in the service of the United States on the 11th day of May, 1865, and has since been held in confinement as "a prisoner of war" and "a prisoner of State" in Fortress Monroe, Virginia; and whereas the said Jefferson Davis stands charged on the highest authority with the heinous crime of conspiracy to murder the late President of the United States, Abraham Lincoln, and is also indicted for treason; and whereas the said Jefferson Davis has persistently declared his innocence of the offenses charged against him, and through his legal advisers, by all means known to the law, has sought and demanded a speedy and public trial by due process of law before a civil tribunal of competent jurisdiction; Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring) That the longer confinement of the said Jefferson Davis without a trial, or the assignment of a specific time for a trial, is not in accordance with the demands of justice, the spirit of the laws, or the requirements of the Constitution; and that common justice, sound public policy, and the national honor unite in recommending that the said Jefferson Davis be brought to a speedy and a public trial, or that he be released from confinement on bail, or on his own recognizance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that this resolution be laid upon the table and printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope not. I should like the Senate to take some action on that subject. If the motion is not debatable, I will say nothing on the subject now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF NAME OF VESSEL.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be requested to return to the Senate Senate bill No. 60, entitled "A bill to change the name of the steamship Paonshun."

HIRAM PAULDING.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, I trust the Senator from Maine will withdraw his objection to the bill that I reported.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. With pleasure.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask that the bill that I reported a few moments ago be now taken up.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 100) supplementary to an act for the relief of Hiram Paulding, rear admiral United States Navy. It appropriates a sufficient sum to pay the claim of Rear Admiral Hiram Paulding, as provided for by an act of Congress passed at the last session, the sum not to exceed $3,653 92.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is that?

Mr. SUMNER. It is to correct an error.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What sort of an error?

Mr. SUMNER. There was no appropriation in the other bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMISSION OF DUTY ON WORKS OF ART.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 8.

Mr. MORGAN. I reported a joint resolution a short time ago, and asked for its consideration; but it was objected to, and was laid aside for the moment until the Senator from Maine could make some reports. I hope the Senator from Oregon will allow that to be considered now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to have this resolution determined as soon as practicable, as it should be passed at this session.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it is before the Senate it may be laid aside informally to enable the Senator from New York to take up the resolution to which he refers.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the present consideration of the report which I made a few moments since, and which was objected to for the time being.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 25) for the importation into the United States of certain works of art duty free.

Mr. MORGAN. The committee report a substitute for the joint resolution in two sections, which I hope will be adopted.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the resolution and to insert the following:

That from and after the passage of this joint resolution any object of art imported by any individual or association of individuals for presentation, as a gift, to the United States Government, or to any State or city government, shall be admitted free of duty, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to refund the duties paid on any steam agricultural machinery imported into the United States during the current fiscal year as models or for experimentation, and to remit the duties on any steam machinery of like description which may be imported for such purposes prior to the 30th of June, 1868.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to propose an amendment in the form of an additional section, and as it proposes to save to the Government about thirty or forty thousand dollars a year I presume no one will object to it. It is to add the following as an additional section:

And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to discontinue the employment of any officer or person employed under the acts for the collection of direct taxes in the insurrectionary districts within the United States whenever, in his judgment, their service is no longer needed; and he is hereby authorized to devolve upon any officer or officers of internal revenue in said districts any portion of the duties imposed in said acts, who shall perform said duties without additional compensation.

I will simply state that I have a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, which was referred to the Committee on Finance yesterday, stating that quite a number of these officers are no longer needed, and the service may be discharged by the internal revenue officers who have been organized in those States since the close of the war. Most of these offices are now mere sinecures, the officers drawing large pay without doing any service. This amendment is for the purpose of discontinuing them and yet preserving their duties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the resolution to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed; and its title was amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that he had been directed by the House to return to the Senate, in accordance with its request, the bill (S. No. 60) to change the name of the steamship Paonshun.

The message further announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 16) for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 15) suspending all proceedings in relation to payment for slaves drafted or received as volunteers in the military service of the United States, and the enrolled bill (S. No. 61) to provide for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, and for other purposes; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

HEIRS OF JOHN E. BOULIGNY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) directing the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the execution of a law passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny.

Mr. JOHNSON. This resolution was postponed yesterday on my motion, to give me an opportunity to examine, as well as the time allowed me would enable, the title to the land to which the resolution refers, and I have come to the conclusion that the title is very clear. I listened to the honorable member from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] with all the respect which I sincerely entertain for his opinion, and have under the same feeling read with care the opinion of Mr. Justice Nelson in the case reported in 15 Howard, but without being at all satisfied that they were right; on the contrary, so far as that case is concerned, being satisfied that the honorable judge was wrong. It is too late to discuss the title now, as one would desire to discuss a question of that description, at anything like length, or to state elaborately the grounds upon which my opinion rests.

The title is said to have been derived originally from a grant made by the King of France in 1717. The party to whom that grant was made is stated to have assigned it to another party, the ancestor of the present claimants. In November, 1762, that part of Louisiana called, I believe, Lower Louisiana, was ceded by France to Spain, and the Spanish Government sent to take possession of it in their behalf a General O'Reilly. He did take possession, and acted, as history tells us, with an excess of cruelty such as has rarely ever been exhibited by civilized man, hanging and shooting, without any distinction of color or race. Finally, with reference to the grant, he ordered it to be surveyed, limiting it to an extent of front upon the Mississippi river less than was supposed to have been called for by the original French grant, and that survey was made by the surveyor general of France in that territory. Under that survey the ancestor of the present claimants took possession of the land and remained in the undisturbed possession of it for very many years.

In 1824 Congress passed an act, not I believe applicable to Louisiana, authorizing the holders of inchoate titles under grants from Spain or France to institute proceedings before a board of commissioners. In 1835 a supplementary act was passed, giving to the claimants in Louisiana a right to appear before the register and receiver of the land office there for the purpose of making good any claim to lands in Louisiana that they might present. Under that act these claimants did claim this very land; and, as is stated by the register and receiver, the claim itself received full examination, and they adjudged it to be a good one, and, as they were bound to do by the act of 1835 and by the original act, they reported their decision to Congress; but from some cause or other it was not acted upon. I think there is no doubt that if it had been acted on at that time that decision would have been confirmed. Then the title to these very lands would have been beyond dispute. But by the act of 1835 the decision of the receiver and register was only to become operative when it should be sanctioned by Congress; and the failure of Congress to pass upon the subject of that award placed the claimants in the situation in which they were before the act of 1835 was passed.

Then, in 1837, Congress passed another act on the subject, not in relation to this particular claim, but in relation to all claims of an analogous character, by which the claimants were authorized to file a petition in the nature of a bill in chancery in the district court of the United States claiming to have their right examined and decided. That was done, I think, in 1838; but I may be mistaken as to dates, and if I am the mistake is immaterial; but the case came on to be heard before the late Judge McCaleb, whom I knew personally, and who was certainly a very eminent jurist, perfectly familiar with that particular branch of the law which was involved in this class of cases. After a full examination before him, upon all the testimony that was produced on each side, and an argument in behalf of the United States as well as the claimants, he came to the conclusion, and as he said with perfect confidence that he was right, that the title was a good one, the claim a good one, and he so adjudged. If it had stopped there, this title would have been beyond dispute, and the heirs would now be in possession of the property; but the act of 1837 authorized an appeal from the decision of the district judge, and that appeal was had, and the case came on to be heard in the Supreme Court at the term whose decisions are reported in 15 Howard.

I have not time to read, nor is it necessary, the grounds upon which Mr. Justice Nelson stated the opinion which he had formed upon the subject. He said it depended first upon the validity of the original French title; and that gave rise to two questions: first, whether France had ever made the grant; and second, whether if she made the grant, it was made in such form as would separate the land entitled to be granted from the public domain, the Supreme Court having decided in a variety of cases that none of these Spanish or French grants are to be considered as operative at all unless they are made in such terms as show that it was the purpose of the grantor to make some specific conveyance of a part of the public domain; and although it was not necessary to do so by metes and bounds so as to enable a surveyor to run out the lines, yet it was necessary so to describe the land that a surveyor could approximately form a survey. He expressed very great doubt whether there was any such French grant; and doubting upon that subject, he takes up the second branch of the title, what was done by the Spanish Government of Spain by the treaty of November, 1762, and he is not satisfied, although he is evidently in very great doubt, but that the proceedings under that branch of the title were not sufficient to give title to the claimants so far as that title was made to depend upon the original French grant; because he very properly states that what was done by Spain, by Governor O'Reilly, what was done by the Spanish surveyor, and what was followed after the survey was made and the survey approved, referring as they did to the existence of a French grant, were very persuasive, if not conclusive, evidence to show that the French grant had been made. But in relation to what was done by the Spanish Government after they became the owner he came to the result that there was no mode of ascertaining exactly what portion of the property was segregated from the public domain; and in that particular, with all due deference to the learned judge, I think he was in obvious error, if one may be permitted respectfully to say that a judge commits an obvious error, particularly a judge such as he of whom I am now speaking.

At the time when these grants were made—they were made in very large quantities—the rear end of the land granted was a morass, hardly rescued from the state in which apparently it had been placed by nature originally, or by some subsequent causes from the waters, and it was impossible for a surveyor to run the lateral lines back to the extreme limit which the grant would have authorized. What they did, then, was to run a front line of the extent called for by the grant, and to run a very short distance a lateral line, but run it only in the direction which they supposed the line was thereafter to take; and if I know anything of the proceedings under these titles—and I have had a good deal of opportunity of knowing, having tried a good many of these cases—that mode of making the survey was always held to be sufficient; and whether the land passes or not beyond the limit of the lateral lines was made not to depend upon the fact of the extent of those lines, but upon the fact of the direction of the lines themselves, taken in connection with the grant; and if they did not cover as much land as the grant called for, then the lines were to be extended in the direction in which they were run by the surveyor, so as to include a quantity as large as the grant called for.

The learned judge's opinion, therefore, even supposing that the question was before him, was, as I think, erroneous in point of law; but the question was not before the court. As I have stated, the appeal was taken under the provisions of the act of 1837; and the act of 1837 dealt exclusively with inchoate titles, not perfect titles; with equitable, and not legal titles; and hence the court decided, as they had done in every other case which had been brought before them under the act of 1824, or any one of its supplements, that they had no jurisdiction, or that the court below had no jurisdiction to pass upon any other than an inchoate title, however clear it might be, the parties holding perfect titles being at perfect liberty to institute actions of ejectment. A minority of the court, Mr. Justice Curtis, Mr. Justice McLean, Mr. Justice Wayne, and Mr. Justice Campbell, held very properly that they had no right to pass upon the question of title or no title; and the manner in which their dissent upon that question is stated is to me almost conclusive that in their judgment the title was a good one, and that they would have come to that conclusion if the case had been properly before them. I send to the desk the book containing the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Curtis, and I ask that the Secretary be permitted to read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Mr. Justice CURTIS: Justices McLean, Wayne, Campbell, and myself do not understand the opinion which has been delivered by Mr. Justice Nelson as intended to express the judgment of this court upon the validity of the complete French grant, alleged by the petition to have been made by the Western Company to Paris Duvernay in 1717, or upon the effect of the alleged confirmation of such alleged complete French title, or any part thereof, by the Spanish Governors, O'Reilly and Unzuaga. The trial of such a title not being within the jurisdiction of this court upon this petition, according to the repeated decisions of this court, and the plain terms of the act of May 26, 1824, under which we derive our authority, it seems equally clear that the questions, whether there is any sufficient evidence that such a grant was made, or whether it could be located, or whether it embraced the premises in question, or whether it had been in part or in whole confirmed, and how extensive such confirmation, if made, was, are questions not judicially before us; for these questions belong exclusively to the trial of that legal title.

"In our judgment, this embraces the whole case. It exhausts every allegation in the petition, which makes no claim to any incipient or imperfect French or Spanish title. It alleges only a complete French grant, and a confirmation to Dauterive, who was then in possession under it, of part of the land.

"Now, the first section of the act of 1824 provides that a person claiming lands by virtue of a French or Spanish grant, concession, warrant, or order of survey, which might have been perfected into a complete title, may present a petition to the district court setting forth fully, plainly, and substantially, the nature of his claim to the lands, particularly stating the date of the grant, &c., under which he claims; and then it continues: 'and the said court is hereby authorized and required to hold and exercise jurisdiction of every petition presented in conformity with this act, and to hear and determine the same.' Unless, therefore, the petition is presented in conformity with this act, the special and limited jurisdiction which the act confers does not exist. The title shown down by this petition being a complete title, derived from the Western Company and confirmed by the Spanish authorities, and the petitioner not having shown fully, plainly, and substantially, or even by the most obscure suggestion, any other title, we cannot perceive how this court has any jurisdiction under the act of 1824. We add, however, that if, as in the case of Davenport's heirs, at the present term, the petition did duly aver facts, constituting in point of law an imperfect title, we should not consider the petition defective, though it might state an erroneous legal conclusion from those facts, and call the title a perfect one. That is not this case, as may be seen by recurring to the petition.

"Our opinion is, that this petition should be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, without prejudice to any legal title of the petitioners, and that no opinion should be expressed by this court upon any question of fact or law arising upon the evidence."—15 Howard's Reports, page 23.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think I am justified in repeating what I said just now, that those judges were very much inclined to the opinion that the title was a good one; and I am not at all surprised at it, because, as I have said, the only doubt about the title was, first, whether the French grant had been made in fact; second, whether what was done under it by the Spanish Government was so done as to segregate this property from the public domain.

These claimants have had rather a hard time of it. They got a decision in their favor in 1838 by the register and receiver under the act of 1835, and that was not acted upon by Congress. They then, under the authority of the act of 1837, went into the district court and presented their case, stating all the facts of the case, and they obtained a decision in that court confirming their title, and the opinion is stated in very decided terms by the judge, who, I may say without any disrespect to the judges of the Supreme Court, was, perhaps, because of his greater familiarity with the law on the subject, more competent to decide the question than any one of them; and then upon appeal the result was what I have stated, that a majority of the Supreme Court held that they could not pass upon the question because they had no jurisdiction; and it is now stated that the title is to be considered as a bad one because one of the judges thought proper, in performing what no doubt he supposed to be his duty, to express doubts about the title, although the question with him, if he took the same view with his associate judges, was just as clearly out of the jurisdiction of the court, as it was in their opinion, because he held, and he could not but so hold, the act of 1824 and the act of 1836 being very clear on the subject, that the district court had no authority to examine into a legal title, and as in his opinion the title here was a legal title alone, if there was any title, the case must be dismissed. Then they went to Congress; and what was done by Congress? I do not know that I have all the reports before me; but in 1860 the claimants presented their petition and it was referred to the House Committee on Private Land Claims. On the 6th of April, 1860, that committee made a report through their chairman, Mr. NOELL. I will not read the report; but it is full upon the subject. That committee came to the conclusion that the title was perfectly good, but the report was not acted upon. It was renewed again and referred to the same committee when Mr. Thayer, of Pennsylvania, was chairman of the committee, and he made a report to the same effect. The bill which we are now asked to suspend was reported by the Committee on Private Land Claims of this body, through its then chairman, Judge Harris; and in the speech with which he supported the bill, as reported in the Globe—of course I shall not fatigue the Senate by reading it—he said that the committee had made a thorough examination of the subject and had come to the conclusion that the title was a valid one and ought to be allowed, and they so reported in the bill. It was debated in the Senate and passed by a vote of 30 yeas to 10 nays, not without examination, not without discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it is the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is Senate joint resolution No. 32.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should be glad if the measure before the Senate were allowed to be finished at this time. I hope the Senator from Indiana will consent to that. I think it will take but a few minutes.

Mr. MORTON. I prefer to go on with the unfinished business. I have been trying to get action on that subject for two or three days past.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to yielding the floor.

Mr. MORTON. I am afraid the unfinished business will lose its place if it is not proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday being the joint resolution (S. R. No. 32) refunding to the State of Indiana expenses incurred for quartermaster and commissary stores, and for transportation furnished to militia of said State while engaged in repelling rebel raids during the late rebellion, is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORTON. I understand that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] has prepared an amendment which he proposes to offer. If so, I should like to hear it.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is an amendment pending which I should like to have voted on first.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Ohio offered an amendment to include the State of Ohio within the provisions of this resolution.

I hope that amendment will not be adopted. I will state that special acts have been passed in favor of West Virginia, Missouri, and Pennsylvania, providing for the same class of claims; and I submit that there is no reason why Ohio should be attached to this measure. If Ohio has claims of this character it is perfectly competent for her Senators to introduce a bill covering them. Special bills have been passed in regard to other States, and I trust this measure will be allowed to go through without encumbering it by adding the claim of Ohio or any other State.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, there can be no possible objection to including our State. These expenses all grow out of certain raids made upon the States of Ohio and Indiana; they affected our people as well as the people of Indiana. These raids did not affect any other States but those two. Large numbers of the population were called to Cincinnati on the occasion. Many of the very soldiers provided for in this measure came from Indiana to Cincinnati. They went from all parts of the two States, and gathered there to repel the Kirby Smith raid, and also to meet and overcome the force of Morgan, who entered Indiana, traversed a good portion of that State, and then passed through a portion of Ohio, and was finally captured with his command. These two raids in different years caused the principal items of expenditure that would be allowed under this resolution. I trust Ohio will be included in it. It will certainly not weaken the measure, because if there is any reason for it so far as Indiana is concerned, there is certainly the same reason as to Ohio. No other States need be added, because no others are in the same condition. The States which were the scene of war were in a very different condition from States like Ohio and Indiana, who were suddenly called upon to repel a public enemy.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, rose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know how far this is to go. If it is to begin with Indiana and then Ohio is to be added, and then Tennessee, and then Kentucky, and then Missouri, and I do not know how many more States, all the States who may fancy they have claims generally for these things, I must oppose the whole of it. I was disposed to amend this resolution so as to guard it properly and let it go; but if it is going to include so much as to swamp us in this way I shall be opposed to the whole of it. I wished to propose some amendments; but I want to know how far it is to go.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to the measure of the Senator from Indiana, but during what was called the Quantrell raid and Price raid in my State bills were incurred which have been audited under a commission, and the Senate has agreed to an appropriation of $259,000 to meet those expenses, but it has not yet passed the other House. I should be glad to move that proposition as an amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. That has nothing to do with this case.

Mr. POMEROY. It is precisely like this.

Mr. SHERMAN. Here is a case where Ohio and Indiana paid money to raise troops for the purpose of repelling raids.

Mr. POMEROY. Our State paid this $259,000, audited the claims and sent them here for payment. A bill for that purpose has passed the Senate, but I shall not move it as an amendment to this measure unless other States are included in it. If that be done I shall feel it my duty to move such an amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the amendment to include Ohio will be rejected. It will only open the door for a good many others; and it is not exactly fair when a Senator from one State has his bill pending to load it down in this way with amendments. I am willing to take this measure on its merits, confined to the cause of Indiana; but if we put upon it everything Senators choose to move as amendments, adding a thousand matters that we do not understand,

I shall be constrained to oppose the whole, and to ask that there be a thorough examination of all these claims before any bill is passed, and let them come here under some official recommendation.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I am willing to withdraw all objections to the measure proposed by the Senator from Indiana. John Morgan was killed in my town, within a short distance from where I live, and Tennessee suffered more, perhaps, than any State in the Union from these raids; but still I am willing to withdraw all objection and to withdraw my amendment, reserving, however, the privilege to present the matter in another form.

Mr. MORTON. I have just learned from the remarks of the Senator from Kansas that Kansas has claims of the same kind, a bill for which has already passed the Senate. Then West Virginia has been provided for; Missouri has been provided for; Pennsylvania has been provided for, and Kansas also has been provided for so far as the action of the Senate goes. It seems to me, in view of the action of Congress, there ought to be no objection to the passage of this joint resolution, provided it is in a form that will meet the views of Senators with proper limitations. So far as the claims of Ohio are concerned, the Senator from Ohio can present a bill or resolution covering that case. I should have no objection to its being put into this measure but that I do not want my resolution loaded down in such a way as to make the impression on the Senate that it covers a great deal. Let each State be provided for by itself in a special act, as has been done already in the case of four States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs. I make the motion because a bill which shall cover this subject and do justice to all the States alike ought to be carefully prepared, providing for a commission that should hear similar and analogous claims of all the States at the same time, so as to do justice to all upon the same ground. The State of Vermont, to my personal knowledge, has expended nearly or quite one hundred thousand dollars, just, proper, legitimate expenses, which she was obliged to submit to in the raising of her troops, in protecting herself against raids that were actually made upon her, and others that were threatened. Now, I think it invidious to provide for one State without providing for the others. I think the just claims of Indiana ought to be examined and settled; but the only way that all these claims can be examined and settled will be under a bill which shall provide for commissioners who shall hear and examine them and report them to the War Department, and then an appropriation may be made. This bill being recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, they ought to examine it carefully and make a provision of the nature that I suggest, and then report it back and let it be passed.

The Senate will bear in mind, according to the statement of the chairman of that committee, in debate the other day, that this resolution has not been considered, in the appropriate and correct sense of that term, in that committee at all. It was simply reported as a matter of favor to the Senator from Indiana, that he might bring it to the attention of the Senate. Now justice, security to the public, and at the same time, to the Treasury, requires that this subject should be carefully examined and provision made for a commission that shall not be limited to any one State alone, or a series of commissions, limiting in some general way the extent of their inquiry, requiring evidence and vouchers, and then report to the War Department. It is with that view that I make the motion to recommit.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the motion to recommit will not prevail. It comes at a very late hour, and will certainly be fatal to this resolution, as the Senator must well understand. No better illustration of the impropriety of putting on different States can be made than the proposition of the Senator from Vermont. He says a raid was made into that State which caused the State of Vermont to expend nearly one hundred thousand dollars. Whether that was an act of war or simply an act of public robbery might be a question open for discussion. If an act of public robbery, the Government of the United States cannot be called upon to pay the expenses. If an act of war properly connected with the rebellion, the case is different. Now, I submit to the Senator from Vermont that it would be unfair to the State of Indiana to ask the consideration of her claim to be connected with or to be influenced by the consideration of the claim of Vermont in the case of the St. Albans raid. Why, then, discriminate among States? A similar act has been passed in regard to Pennsylvania, in regard to West Virginia, in regard to Missouri, and in regard to Kansas; and now the proposition to reimburse Indiana is to be loaded down by considering claims upon the part of Vermont and upon the part of Ohio. I submit that this is not dealing with even-handed justice with the several States. The State of Vermont is ably represented, and her claim can be presented, and will undoubtedly be dealt with fairly by the Senate, and will not suffer by being disconnected with this case; but if my resolution is to be loaded down by the claim of Ohio, by the claim of Vermont, by the claim of Tennessee, there may be an apparent aggregate of claims that will frighten Congress. I submit that that is not dealing with the State of Indiana as four other States have been dealt with already. There is no more reason for doing what the Senator from Vermont proposes now than there was when these other special acts were passed. I submit, therefore, that as an act of justice between the States this proposition should not be insisted upon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. One reply, which ought to be a satisfactory one, that can be made to my friend from Indiana is that the proposition which he submits in this resolution, as I understand it, is altogether a different one from that which has been passed in respect to the States he has named. Those acts, so far as they have been passed since I have had the honor to be here, and so far as I recollect, have been acts appointing a commission of examination and inquiry, and then, awaiting a reexamination by the War Department, an appropriation has been made to pay them. It is really a proceeding of inquiry. Here, however, is a joint resolution which directs the Secretary of War to settle the claims of the State of Indiana, and to pay them, not only for her national troops mustered into the national service, but for all the expenses of her militia during this whole period. It is not by its peculiar phraseology, as I construe it, confined to her militia raised for the purpose of repelling any one raid, but its language is so broad as that fairly under the resolution, if we pass it, the State of Indiana will be entitled to be reimbursed for all her militia and military expenses of every description. I do not say, by any means, that that is the intent of my honorable friend; I do not think it is; but the Secretary of War will be guided, not by the intent of the Senator from Indiana, but by the words of the resolution. Now, ought we to consider or to pass a resolution of that kind? Obviously not.

Then, again, I beg leave to suggest to my friend from Indiana that the raid into Vermont bore quite as much of a warlike character while it lasted, and was backed by a more powerful enemy, the Canadians close at hand, and a more safe asylum than were the raids that were made into the State of Indiana. There can be no distinction against Vermont on that ground. Then, further, I said when I was up before, which appears to have escaped the notice of my friend, that a very large part of this sum of $100,000, which I stated in round numbers—I do not mean to say that that is the exact amount—was for expenses incurred by the State of Vermont in the first call by the nation for troops that were raised and sent when we had no Army regulations or special instructions from the War Department as to this or that class of expenses; and while there was no extravagance, no waste, no peculation, of any description, when the accounts for these necessary expenditures came to be submitted to the War Department, they took out the Blue-Book of Army Regulations and just cut out from our account of money thus honestly and necessarily spent every dollar that did not conform to the regular Army standard. Of course it was a gross injustice. I do not say it was an injustice in a technical sense on the part of the War Department officers in refusing it, because perhaps they were right in their construction.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask my friend from Vermont whether claims on behalf of the State of Vermont have been adjusted and paid by the Government of the United States?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not quite understand the question.

Mr. MORTON. It is whether the claims of Vermont have been adjusted by the Government of the United States, except so much as has been rejected?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly. The claims of the State of Vermont, so far as they were agreed to by the War Department, have been paid, or all but a small balance, and so far as they were not agreed to they were not paid. I take it it is the same with Indiana precisely.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, if there is no obstacle in the law there is no necessity for this resolution. I take it the Senator from Indiana does not assume the position that he is introducing this joint resolution for the purpose of compelling the War Department to obey some existing law, but he is endeavoring to enlarge the existing law so as to embrace a class of cases not now embraced by the law as it stands; and that is precisely the status of the State of Vermont. Her claims are just. I dare say the claims of the State of Indiana are; I do not question that now; but we have had no inquiry into that; the committee has not inquired into it. I dare say they are just. I know those of the State of Vermont are. Now, then, why do we distinguish? Why do we direct in one case that the Secretary of War shall settle and pay, when in the case of West Virginia we merely provided a commission of inquiry?

I think, Mr. President, that every consideration of fairness, of justice, and of prudence requires that this subject should be sent back to the committee.

Mr. MORTON. So far as the special acts in the case of West Virginia and other States provided for appointing commissioners there was a reason for it that does not exist in the case of the State of Indiana. A part of the claims covered by those special acts had not been paid by the several States, but were to some extent unliquidated. The Senator from Maine is mistaken in saying that this resolution requires payment of all the expenses incurred. The resolution expressly provides that the Secretary of War shall be authorized to determine whether the expenses were necessarily and properly incurred. In drawing the resolution I took occasion to guard the interests of the Government. If the Senator will read it he will find it so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend will allow me, I will read it.

That the expenses incurred by the State of Indiana for quartermaster and commissary stores, and transportation furnished by the State to the Indiana militia during the late rebellion while engaged in repelling raids, guarding against raids and insurrections—

Now the phraseology changes—or while in any way engaged in the military service of the United States during said rebellion, shall be duly and properly examined by the proper Departments or bureaus, under the direction of the Secretary of War, who shall cause to be paid and reimbursed to said State all such expenses as shall be found to have been necessarily and properly incurred, and that an appropriation is hereby made for that purpose out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

This limitation as to the necessity and propriety relates to the intrinsic nature of the service performed. Therefore, if it was necessary and proper that the State of Indiana, in order to preserve her domestic peace, should raise her militia, and put them on foot and transport them hither and thither, it is a part of the duty of the Secretary of War to pay for that. That is to say, every step of precaution which the State of Indiana thought it necessary to take, and did take, in the way of guarding against apprehended raids, or apprehended insurrections of her own citizens, is to be paid for out of the public money of the United States.

The question is whether that is not going to a length that we have never gone before. The States as far as my observation and reading have gone have always kept up their militia systems, and kept their troops armed and drilled and disciplined at their own expense for the purpose of preserving the domestic peace of their own citizens within their own borders. Now, why should the State of Indiana in her loyal and populous and well-governed community come forward with a claim to be paid for these precautionary measures for preserving the peace of her own citizens and within her own borders, when every other State has done exactly the same thing, and has never thought of asking pay for it. That is the question, and I undertake to say that you cannot put any other construction on the language of this resolution than that which I have given, because this provision is made for repelling rebel raids, guarding against raids and insurrections, and then the phraseology changes to the alternative "or," it then proceeds to say, "while in any way engaged in the military service of the United States," so that it is not necessary for the payment of these claims, under this resolution, that this militia should have been under orders from the War Department; it is not necessary that they should have been in any way engaged in the service of the United States. This additional clause about the service of the United States is alternative and cumulative, not qualificatory and in the way of limitation.

Therefore I think I was right when I said this went the length of paying all the military and militia expenses of the State of Indiana during the war, because they all must have been incurred either in repelling rebel raids or in guarding against domestic violence and insurrection at home; and if you treat every other State in the same language with which you are to treat the State of Indiana by the resolution, the amount of money to be raised by taxation for the next twenty years will not begin to pay it. I do not say it is therefore unjust, I only say it is therefore totally impracticable.

Mr. MORTON. I submit that the objection taken to the resolution is clearly a special demurrer. No one can read the resolution without understanding that all these expenses have been incurred on account of the rebellion and growing out of it. There is some exception, however, taken to the phraseology, and I understand the Senator from Maine has prepared an amendment which will perhaps obviate all the objection taken by the Senator from Vermont. But this resolution clearly contemplates nothing but expenses incurred in the State for repelling raids and keeping down rebellion in the State and guarding against raids from other States.

So far as the troops being in the service of the United States is concerned, that is specially provided for; and then comes the general safety clause, for the safety of the Government, that the Secretary of War shall be made the judge as to whether these expenses were necessarily and properly incurred. There is no necessity in this case for a special commission. They could do nothing more than will be done by the War Department on these claims and vouchers to be sent here. The case is essentially different from that of the State of Missouri and the State of Pennsylvania. The State has audited these claims. They have passed through the hands of the war department of the State; they are in perfect form; but notwithstanding their form, and although I think the Government would be bound to accept the honor of a State in the presentation of such accounts, it is finally referred to the decision of the Secretary of War as to whether these claims were necessarily and properly incurred. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont this question: whether the claims of the State of Vermont for quartermaster and commissary stores and transportation have been allowed by the general Government?

Mr. EDMUNDS. A part of them have been allowed, and a part of them have not. As I said before, these claims were allowed that came within what used to be called Army regulations, when I say the fair construction of the original law under which the States were called upon makes no such limitation; but provision was made, and the declaration was made, that the States should be reimbursed for their necessary expenses. When the War Department came to audit the vouchers and accounts, which were all in regular form, they said that no expense was necessary or proper except that provided in the regulations for the government of the regular Army which were provided for a state of peace. Hence, there were hundreds and thousands and tens of thousands of dollars which were perfectly just, to my certain personal knowledge, because I had charge of the settlements with the War Department, and was in the midst of it when the expenditure was made, which were rejected, and have not been paid to this day. But of course that is no reason why any just claim of the State of Indiana should not be paid, because they did injustice to us. That is not my point; but I say there ought not to be this haste, and that we ought to consider this general subject altogether in the spirit of a mutual desire to do justice to all the States, and dispose of it. That is the reason I object to this haste about it; and that is why I think it ought to be sent back to the committee.

Mr. MORTON. It appears now from the statement of the Senator from Vermont that a part of her claims for quartermaster and commissary stores and transportation have already been allowed and paid. So far she is that much better off than the State of Indiana. Not one dollar of our claims of that character has been paid. I do not know of any existing general law that provides for the payment of such claims. There is a general law providing for the payment of the militia of the several States, engaged as our militia have been, under which the Government of the United States has paid the State of Indiana several hundred thousand dollars, and audited claims for certain other amounts, the appropriation for which is now exhausted; but that act does not extend, as I understand it, beyond pay for services. There is no general law authorizing payment of claims of the character this resolution covers, but special laws have been passed in the cases of Missouri, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Kansas. It appears now that the State of Vermont, without a special law, has gotten a part of her claims of this character allowed. So far she has been fortunate. Having been fortunate so far, I submit that it is not in good taste for the State of Vermont to stand in the way of other States getting what they have paid out. But if it was proper that a general law should be enacted for claims of this character, why was not that objection made when four other States have been provided for?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me say to the Senator that in those cases I am informed, and such is my memory, that the act provided for a commission in the first place. A commission was authorized to be appointed to examine the claims and report such sums as had been actually paid by the several States and were properly vouched; and the report of that commission when it was returned was subject also to revision by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department. The difference between the cases, then, is that the Senator dispenses with the examination by a commission in the first place, and there has not even been an examination by the Committee on Military Affairs any further than has been stated. There is the distinction between the cases. I am not saying that this allowance may not be proper, but I do not want those cases used as an argument, because Congress was very particular about them to have them examined in that way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the leave of the Senate, I should like now, in furtherance of what my friend from Maine has said, to call the attention of the Senate to the provisions made by the law providing for West Virginia, which is a sample. I happen to have it in my hand. The first section provides that—

"The President shall appoint three commissioners, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the amount of moneys expended by the State of West Virginia in enrolling, supplying, equipping, subsisting, transporting, and paying such State forces as have been called into service in such State since the 20th day of June, 1861, to act in concert with the United States forces in suppression of rebellion against the United States."

Then the second section provides:

"That the commissioners so appointed shall proceed at once to examine all the expenditures made by said States for the purpose herein named, allowing for disbursements made and amounts assumed by the State for enrolling, equipping, subsisting, transporting, supplying, and paying such troops as were called into service by the Governor, at the request of the United States department commander commanding the district in which West Virginia may at the time have been included, or by the express order, consent, or concurrence of such commander, or which may have been employed in suppressing rebellion in said State. And no allowance shall be made for any troops which did not perform actual military service in full concert and coöperation with the authorities of the United States, and subject to their orders."

It then proceeds to give further detail as to how the commissioners shall proceed, and requires them to allow no expenditures at greater rate than the laws of the United States or the Army regulations allowed in similar cases. Then it provides that when they ascertain these balances they shall send them to the Treasury Department, and the proper accounting officers shall again go over the subject and report to the Secretary of the Treasury. If it then appears that anything is due within the scope of these limitations it is to be paid.

Now, I submit to my friend from Indiana—and I do not wish him to feel that what I say is in any spirit of hostility to that claim, but only in a spirit of having a fair inquiry and a distinct limitation, so that we shall all understand it—I submit to him that there is a decided and a manifest contrast between this law, which we only passed on the 21st of last June, and the resolution now upon the table.

Mr. MORTON. I submit that upon the reading of that law and my resolution there is no safeguard for the Government of the United States furnished by the law that is not equally furnished by my resolution. The discretion is placed in the War Department expressly to determine as to the necessity and propriety of incurring these expenses, the propriety of their being paid by the Government of the United States; and these claims, by the general law governing the Treasury Department, must be examined by the accounting officers without a special provision on that subject. No matter how much they may have been examined by the War Department, no matter though they may have been passed by a special commission, the general law still requires the Secretary of the Treasury to have them examined and audited before they are paid. That applies to all cases without a special enactment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is mistaken about that. There is a general law applicable to all cases where there is no particular law; but this would take these claims out of that general law. As he has drafted the resolution they would not go through that ordeal.

Mr. MORTON. That is not my experience. Accounts that have passed the War Department, under the general law passed in 1861, have still undergone special revision in the Treasury Department.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is in force unless another law is passed afterward taking a particular case out of the purview of the general law.

Mr. MORTON. I think unless some act was passed exempting these claims from such revision by the Treasury Department, they would still have to be revised by the Treasury Department, and have to pass through the ordinary machinery of that Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask my friend from Indiana whether there is not a very decided difference between his resolution, which declares that the State shall be paid for her militia used in guarding against raids and insurrection, and that clause of the law as to West Virginia which provides that none of her troops shall be paid unless they were acting under the express orders of the United States department commanders, and were therefore in substance and effect United States troops, operating for the benefit of the United States, and under the control of United States officers. Is there not a very wide distinction between those two classes of cases, saying nothing about the methods of accountability?

Mr. MORTON. The militia of the State of Indiana when called out were as much engaged in the service of the United States in repelling rebel raids as though they had been mustered into the service of the United States, and were as much entitled to be paid, and the State is as much entitled to be reimbursed for the expenses incurred. There can certainly be no distinction raised on that point that contains any substance. The question is submitted to the War Department whether these expenses were properly incurred as a part of the suppression of the rebellion and protecting against the consequences of it. If further security can be provided than the resolution contains, it has not yet been pointed out.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not wish to offer any opposition to the Senator's bill, but in the present shape of the measure I cannot give it my support. It ought certainly to be better guarded than it is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have prepared several amendments to it, to which the Senator from Indiana has agreed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to go back to the committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think so, too; but I say I have drawn several amendments which I believe the Senator from Indiana has agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. My impression is that any amendment that does not require these expenses to be confined, as the Senator from Vermont very properly says, to an expenditure for militia that acted under the command or under the authority of the United States officer, and also any provision that will prevent the report that may be made of expenses from going before the accounting officers of the Treasury, ought not to be adopted. For some years I made an effort to get passed a bill allowing a similar claim to Missouri. In 1864 I prepared the measure from which the Senator from Vermont has read, and which was afterward adopted by the Senators from West Virginia in the passage of a measure for their State. When the proposition was presented before the Senate and discussed here, it was thought proper to guard the bill by the provision which now appears in the respective laws, requiring that the report of the commission that was originally required should be subjected to an inspection by the accounting officers, not of the War Department, but of the Treasury. In the case of Missouri three commissioners were appointed to examine the claims, and they examined them with reference to the laws of the United States. No claim could be paid to the militia that had been contracted at a greater rate than that allowed by the laws of the United States to the volunteers in service under the Federal laws. The Senator from Indiana will see that he provides in the measure now pending—

That the expenses incurred by the State of Indiana for quartermaster and commissary stores, and transportation furnished by the State to the Indiana militia during the late rebellion while engaged in repelling rebel raids, guarding against raids and insurrections, or while in any way engaged in the military service of the United States during said rebellion, shall be duly and properly examined by the proper departments or bureaus, under the direction of the Secretary of War, who shall cause to be paid and reimbursed to said State all such expenses as shall be found to have been necessarily and properly incurred, and that an appropriation is hereby made for that purpose out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Now, sir, suppose that the State of Indiana paid to her militia twice as much per month as Federal volunteers received; are we to allow and pay the amount actually expended by the State of Indiana? Suppose that for transportation a double amount was allowed; are we to pay that double amount? Suppose that there was a system of extravagance in subsisting the Indiana militia; are we bound to pay it? Suppose that no law or rule was adopted in supplying the subsistence department of the militia; are we to allow it? There is certainly no limitation here. In the bills providing for the other States it will be found that no greater amount was to be allowed to the militia in the way of payment, no greater amount in the commissary department, no greater amount in the quartermaster's department, than was allowed in similar departments in the Federal service. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that a provision of that sort ought to be inserted in this bill. We ought not to obligate ourselves beforehand to pay all the expenses that may have been incurred, no matter what or how they may have been incurred. It is better to guard the proposition in such a manner that exorbitant and unreasonable expenses shall not be allowed.

Again, sir, suppose that the State of Indiana called out militia when it was not actually necessary, and when the department commander in the Federal service in charge of that State thought that it was unnecessary, or, indeed, not only intimidated, but declared that he did not want their services, and suppose that they acted independently of the Federal authorities, are we under any obligation whatever to pay the expenses thus incurred? I think not; and hence it was that in the Missouri bill, which was the first passed, it was provided that no expenses should be paid except those that arose in the payment of troops that were raised by the Governor under the express orders of the department commander, or used subject to his orders and his control in repelling invasion. I certainly would be unwilling to pay any expenses that did not accrue under circumstances of that sort. I am utterly unwilling to say that the Federal Government for all time to come shall be responsible for the payment of the demands that may accrue under the orders of the Governor or the Legislature of a State in suppressing insurrection therein, unless it be done with the concurrence at least of the officers of the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state to the Senator the propositions of amendment that I intend to make to this resolution, and he will see how far they will obviate his objections. I propose to insert the words "and paid" after the word "incurred," in the third line. The resolution, as I propose to amend it, will read:

That the expenses incurred and paid by the State of Indiana for quartermaster and commissary stores, and transportation furnished by the State to the Indiana militia during the late rebellion while engaged in repelling and guarding against rebel raids—

I stop there, and then commence again at the ninth line:

shall be duly and properly examined by the accounting officers of the Treasury, and the amount allowed for the same shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Then I propose to add this proviso:

Provided, That all allowances under this resolution shall be subject to and made under such rules as now determine the allowances for commissary and quartermaster stores and transportation furnished for military service: And provided further, That no allowance shall be made for such stores and transportation unless the same were furnished for troops recognized and paid by the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly that amendment will remove many objections to the resolution; but I suggest to the Senator from Maine that in all probability no accounts will be allowed under that amendment. I cannot conceive that the accounting officers of the Treasury will feel themselves under any obligations at all to allow any payment whatever under the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not cover your objection about their being called out by authority of the Federal commander.

Mr. HENDERSON. Of course not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What objection is that?

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Vermont intimates that the amendment would not cover the requirement that I make, that that they should have been called out by authority of a department commander, or else accepted and used under his command.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have provided for that. This, I understand, was a sudden thing, and the militia that were called out have been actually paid by the Government as United States troops for that service. If they have been actually recognized and paid as troops by the General Government for that purpose, I consider that a recognition.

Mr. HENDERSON. Undoubtedly that was a recognition of their service.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In such a case, I think the quartermaster stores, &c., should be paid for also. The troops being recognized by the Government, the stores provided for them should certainly be paid for.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the Senator read that portion of his proposition requiring the accounting officers of the Treasury to examine the accounts?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The resolution will read thus:

That the expenses incurred and paid by the State of Indiana for quartermaster and commissary stores, and transportation furnished by the State to the Indiana militia during the late rebellion, while engaged in repelling and guarding against rebel raids, shall be duly and properly examined by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, and the amount allowed for the same shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know but I was mistaken in supposing that the accounting officers would not feel under any obligation to allow these accounts under that provision.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And then the proviso comes in, in regard to the mode of making the examination.

Mr. HENDERSON. The accounting officers will perhaps deem it their duty under that provision to examine the accounts; but there are no rules, as I understand, prescribed in the examination. Are they to examine and allow them only to the extent that they would allow similar claims in the Federal service?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is precisely what it means.

Mr. HENDERSON. With that provision of course the objections that I have urged to the measure would be very greatly removed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The language is:

Provided, That all allowances under this resolution shall be subject to and made under such rules and regulations as now determine allowances for commissary and quartermaster stores and transportation furnished for military service.

Mr. HENDERSON. That improves it very much. I do not wish to put myself against this measure, and I do not wish the Senator from Indiana to so consider. At the same time, I think perhaps the better plan would be to refer it back to the committee, and let the committee take a copy of the measure that was adopted for West Virginia and Missouri and adapt it to the case of Indiana and any other State having similar claims.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that would be better. It would be very much more satisfactory to me.

Mr. HENDERSON. There are other claims of this sort. There are claims from almost every State; and if we get out of the beaten track we have adopted, and which I think is a perfectly safe one, perhaps we shall open the doors of the Treasury to very large claims in the future. I concur with the Senator from Vermont that the better way would be to recommend it. I have a printed copy of the Missouri bill in my hand, and it would take but a very few moments to adapt it to the case of Indiana and make this measure similar to the measures that we have already adopted, and which have proved a protection to the Treasury. I think that would be the better plan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer this joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 14, noes 10; no quorum voting.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We shall have to ask the yeas and nays. We cannot get Senators to vote without.

Mr. MORTON. I call for the yeas and nays. I will simply say that this motion, if agreed to, will kill the bill for this session.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I simply wish to say that I voted to refer it because the chairman of the Military Committee thought it ought to be committed with a view to having some amendments made.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before I vote, I will ask the Senator from Indiana whether the Missouri bill will not substantially accomplish the object for the benefit both of Ohio and Indiana, if he has examined the subject.

Mr. MORTON. I have not. The Missouri bill was adapted especially to Missouri, and Missouri received millions of dollars where Indiana only claims hundreds of thousands. Missouri has been provided for, and can very well afford to oppose this resolution. I consider that this resolution, as guarded by the amendments offered by the Senator from Maine, as being a safer measure than the Missouri bill. I think it would be safer to leave this matter to the direct inspection of the War Department than to send out a roving commission. We have had enough of these roving commissions. The Secretary of War, in his examination of this matter, can appoint as many commissions as he sees proper to examine these very accounts. I am satisfied with the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, and will accept it. We know very well that Congress is drawing to its close, and that there will be no legislation after this week, and the recommitment of the resolution of course is the end of it. That is very well understood.

Mr. HENDERSON. I really think the remark of my friend is very unkind, and perhaps quite unnecessary, that Missouri having got millions of dollars could very well afford to oppose this resolution. I will state to the Senator that Missouri has not received one cent for all the expenditures made. She has received no more than the State of Indiana.

Mr. POMEROY. What has become of the money?

Mr. HENDERSON. The claims have been reported here by a commission who were in session some seven or eight months, and they are now undergoing an examination before the accounting officers of the Treasury; and not one dollar will be paid to the State until they have been subjected to the closest scrutiny by those officers. I understand they are casting aside a great many of the claims that were allowed by the commission.

Now, sir, let me make one further remark. For several years in this Senate I attempted to provide a measure on this subject that would be unobjectionable, and it was a long time before I could get a measure sufficiently guarded to induce the Senate to adopt it. I had much trouble in getting a recognition of the claims of my State, and I can assure the Senator that if he goes through the same experience that I have had it will be a long time before he gets the claims allowed, and he will cease to become at all excited at opposition to a measure that he desires to put through immediately. The Senator has been here but a very short time. This is the 22d of March, and he took his seat on the 4th. I was for several years after I came to the Senate attempting to get a recognition of these claims on the part of Missouri before I could succeed in even getting a bill passed.

I do not wish to be understood as putting myself in the way of these claims. But let me say to the Senator that the passage of this resolution will enable the War Department to pass upon claims that under the law now must be passed upon by the accounting officers of the Treasury. The resolution, as he proposes it, breaks down the safeguards around the Treasury of the United States, and provides that the war officers may adjust and allow them, and not the officers of the Treasury Department. He does not seem to appreciate the fact that he is absolutely removing the bars that now protect the Treasury. Hence it is that I desire to subject this measure to exactly the same scrutiny that was applied in the case of Missouri, and in the case of all the other States. I do not oppose it on account of the fact that it is from Indiana. I should have made a similar opposition in the case of any other State. As I said before, there are a large number of such claims to be presented. Indiana is not the only State that will present them. Almost every State in the Union has such claims. The Senator on my left [Mr. SHERMAN] says he wants Ohio put in. I suppose Ohio will be added to this very resolution. I shall vote to add it; but when we add Ohio to it I want Ohio to be subject to exactly the same rules that were applied in the case of Missouri, and in the case of the other States that have been provided for heretofore. I do not suppose a dollar has been paid to the State of West Virginia. The Senator from that State perhaps can tell me.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Not a dollar. The commission is now sitting and exercising a very rigid scrutiny, notwithstanding that all the claims were made out in due form and considered by the Legislature, who rejected $60,000 of them, which they paid themselves, and would not present to the Government because they were not in proper form.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, the Senator from Indiana complains that he does not get his measure through in eighteen days. He took his seat here on the 4th of March. The Senators from West Virginia and myself have for four or five years attempted to get an adjudication of the claims of our respective States, (for they existed from the very beginning of the rebellion down to the present time,) and we have gone through the experience that the Senator from Indiana has only had eighteen days of; we have gone through it for years. I really am a little astonished at his excitement and at his unnecessary remark that Missouri had received millions and could very well afford to resist a similar claim in favor of Indiana. Why, sir, I do not wish to protect the Treasury any more in the case of Indiana than in the case of my own State. I provided all these safeguards in the bill that I originally drew in behalf of the State of Missouri; I put them all in, and I would only subject his State to the very same restrictions to which I subjected my State.

Mr. MORTON. Perhaps the State of Missouri has not actually received the money, but she has got a special law passed by which she expects to receive millions where we expect to receive hundreds of thousands. Her claims are enormous compared with ours. I do not say they are not just; but, sir, ours are a mere bagatelle compared with the claims that Missouri has presented to this Government for payment.

Now, as to the length of time I ought to be here in order to get a bill through, I am not exactly prepared to meet that argument. I hope that the State of Indiana will not be held in abeyance until I have had an experience of three or four years in the Senate. I think that the justice of the claims ought not to be made to depend upon conditions of that kind. When the Senate has recognized the rights of States to be paid for claims of this character, and special acts have been passed for several States, I think the argument wants force that the Senator who is asking an allowance of that kind for his State has been here but a short time. Sir, the right of the State of Indiana to have this resolution passed does not depend on the number of days I have been here or the number of years the Senator from Missouri has been here, but depends upon the character of the claims; and as this Government has recognized the rights of States in four cases to be paid for claims of this character, I think the argument falls to the ground.

So far as the limitations are concerned, the amendment prepared and presented by the Senator from Maine is equally guarded, is equally stringent on behalf of the Government, as the provisions of the act for the State of Missouri. The difference is that the examination is to be made by the Departments here under the direct supervision of the Government itself, having full power to reject all claims for expenses that they deem to have been unnecessary or improperly incurred, instead of being intrusted to a roving commission off into Indiana, or anywhere else, for the examination of claims. This Government never does a more unsafe business than when it puts its claims or the liquidation and assessment of damages into the hands of these roving commissions. I think that this is a safer measure for the Government than the one in the case of Missouri.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I cannot find it consistent with my views of my duty here to vote to allow the claims of the State of Indiana to be settled and adjusted on any other rules and principles, as regards their investigation and scrutiny, than were applied to similar claims of my own State. A reference of this subject to the Secretary of War means nothing else than a reference to his clerks; that these claims are to go through the usual form of any demand presented to the War Department. The character of the service and all those matters connected with them are subjects that the clerks there cannot properly take into consideration. In the case of the claims of West Virginia commissioners have been sitting now for some time, who are subjecting them to the most rigid scrutiny. Although the greatest pains were taken by the State, even going so far that our vouchers were made out on United States blanks, were scrutinized by our adjutant general and military officers, then subjected to the examination of a committee of the Legislature, who rejected, as I stated awhile ago, some sixty thousand dollars of them simply because they were not in proper form, although the State paid them, we have submitted cheerfully to all these conditions, and our case is now in process of adjustment. The amount is but two or three hundred thousand dollars; but so far as it goes it is something to us.

Some years ago the claim of Missouri was presented, and was discussed and examined here in the Senate, and, as I understood the principle upon which these claims should be allowed, was fixed. I believe the Pennsylvania bill had previously passed without the same scrutiny or the same terms and conditions. But finding these bills were coming in from several States, the Senate investigated thoroughly the subject, and adopted a form by which the relief was to be granted to the State of Missouri. Being aware of that, when our claim came up for consideration, the Committee on Military Affairs reported a bill based upon that of Missouri. We were entirely willing to agree to it, and accepted it cheerfully, and it is now being acted upon. We have been somewhat delayed, it is true, but we are perfectly willing to lose whatever these commissioners shall not find just and right. But a small portion of our demand is for commissary stores and subsistence and transportation and things of that kind. Our militia were out repeatedly and under circumstances for which we make no claim. We might have presented a much larger bill. We might probably have fairly asked for more compensation than we have. But, sir, I will conclude as I began, by saying that I cannot find it consistent with my views of my duty here to vote to pay Indiana under circumstances which were not granted to my State, and thus tacitly acknowledge that a more rigid scrutiny and stronger vouchers and things of that kind should be demanded from the State of West Virginia than from the State of Indiana.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called) said: I intended to have said a word before the yeas and nays were called. I rose merely for the purpose of saying that according to my knowledge of the practice of the Departments, the reference of these claims to the Department would be a much better security for the Government than their reference to any board of commissioners. I therefore vote "nay."

The result was then announced—yeas 26, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Conkling, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Pomeroy, Ross, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Cole, Conness, Davis, Johnson, Morton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sumner, Thayer, and Wade—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Cragin, Drake, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howe, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, and Stewart—16.

So the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs was agreed to.

RELIEF OF DESTITUTE IN THE SOUTH.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 16) for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States, which were in line five, after the word "classes" to insert "of destitute or helpless persons;" and in line ten to strike out all after the word "prescribed" to the end of the resolution, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

And to that end the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, through the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, to apply so much as he may deem necessary for the purposes aforesaid of the unexpended moneys heretofore appropriated to supply freedmen and refugees with provisions or rations: Provided, That the expenditure shall not extend beyond the present appropriations already made for the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that the Senate will concur in the amendments of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question, and declared that the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. MORTON. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONNESS. It was an almost unanimous vote. I do not see the necessity of calling for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Dixon, Doolittle, Morton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, and Wade—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Cragin, Davis, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howe, Norton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Sprague—15.

So the amendments were concurred in.

HEIRS OF JOHN E. BOULIGNY.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of House joint resolution No. 8.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us take that up. It ought to be settled.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have occupied all the morning hour with that, and I hope the Senator will allow me to call up a little bill that I introduced yesterday.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is very important, and it ought to be passed at once.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It has already occupied the attention of the Senate for two or three days.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is very important.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a private claim.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; it is to prevent a great fraud. It proposes to suspend the operation of an act passed at the last session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope this joint resolution will be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask the Senator from Oregon now, as this resolution is up, if he will let it lay aside for a short time to allow me to take a vote on the bill to relieve the Chief Justice from the appointment of these registers in bankruptcy.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope not. I hope there will be no extraordinary proceeding to get up a bill which I do not think ought to be considered, and certainly ought not to pass. If a single objection will prevent its being taken up, I object to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it could pass without discussion I would not object; but that will evidently lead to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution which is before the Senate will be proceeded with if no motion to postpone is made.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) directing the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the execution of a law passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouigny.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon this resolution the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. I stated, I think just before the resolution was postponed before the morning hour expired, that this title had been passed upon favorably by three committees of Congress, never decided against by Congress; but, on the contrary, the decision was in favor of it by both branches of Congress at different times, although they did not act conjunctively. I stated also that the last committee who reported on the subject, of which the late member from New York [Mr. Harris] was the chairman, examined it very thoroughly. I now understand that besides himself, who was very competent to investigate a question of this description, it was examined with as much care as he would have examined a case before him judicially by the late Senator from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] and who concurred in thinking that the title was a good one, and who, I have no doubt, is still of that opinion; and I need not say to those to whom I am now addressing myself that his opinion upon a question of that description is entitled to every possible weight.

Then the case stands thus: Congress has heretofore, upon every occasion that they have been called upon to examine the question through their committees, decided in favor of the claim. The registers and receivers who were made judicial officers for the purpose, under the act of 1836, decided in favor of the claim. The judge of the district court in Louisiana decided in favor of the claim. The Supreme Court of the United States only, as I think, avoided so deciding, the majority of them, because the question was not before them, the court below having no jurisdiction, as they thought, of a title which if it existed at all was a legal title, and of course upon an appeal the Supreme Court of the United States had no jurisdiction.

Then a few days since, after a full examination, as they tell us, by the Committee on Private Land Claims, composed in part of the two gentlemen to whom I have adverted, members of eminence in their profession before they went upon the bench, who increased their eminence as jurists after they got upon the bench, they decided in favor of the claim, and the Senate by a vote of 30 to 10 confirmed their report, and passed the bill which we are now asked to suspend. And when are we asked to suspend it? A few days before it is known that Congress will adjourn. And we are asked to suspend it, so far as the House is concerned, because of facts stated in the preamble, which are so wholly unfounded in point of fact, or which are not made good by any evidence before the Senate of the United States, that they have by a vote nearly unanimous stricken out the preamble. Then we are asked to suspend this law only because the House say that perhaps some mistake was committed, discarding as we do the grounds upon which they suppose a mistake was committed. We are to suspend it until Congress shall order otherwise. That puts it in the power of the House; no matter what may be the opinion of the Senate in relation to the claim, to defeat the claim altogether. If the resolution is to pass I propose to amend it by striking out the words "until the further order of Congress," and substituting for them "until the end of the next session of Congress." I shall offer that amendment at the proper time.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland moves to amend the resolution in the fourth line by striking out the words "further order" and inserting "close of the next session;" so that it will read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to suspend the execution of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny" until the close of the next session of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not offer it now. I said I would offer it at the proper time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have great confidence in the opinion of the honorable Senator from Maryland when he understands a case; but manifestly, from what he has said this morning, he has not examined the facts connected with this report, and of course his argument is not entitled to as much weight as it would otherwise be. Now, I invite the attention of the Senator and of the Senate to what I am about to say, and then I know the Senator will admit that the bill that passed the last session of Congress committed a gross injustice upon the Government of the United States.

The Senator who made the report in favor of the bill that passed at the last session referred to antecedent reports and decisions, and seemed to rely upon those, without any particular examination of the case; and the honorable Senator has pursued the same course. He says that the register and receiver at one time decided in favor of this claim? I say they never made any such decision. I have the decision of the register and receiver here. They decided that the heirs of Dauterive were entitled to a tract of land forty arpents front on the Mississippi river and extending back to the Atchafalaya river.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is all they get.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; the bill that passed at the last session allows these heirs a tract of land four leagues in front up and down the Mississippi river, and extending twelve miles back, when the register and receiver decided that they were only entitled to a tract of land forty acres broad on the Mississippi river, and extending back to the Atchafalaya river. I have the decision here, I will read it. Here is the decision, verbatim et literatim:

"The heirs of Bernard Dauterive claim the confirmation of their title to a tract of land in the parish of Iberville, on the west bank of the Mississippi, having forty-four arpents front, and running back to the Atchafalaya, with the exception of so much thereof as has been confirmed to other persons, or has been sold by the United States, for which they intend to claim compensation from the United States.

"The part of this tract is designated on the returned township plats of township No. 10, range thirteen E, as lots thirty-four to forty-seven inclusive; but this part (front) is not claimed, but only what still remains unconfirmed or unsold behind the said front tract, and between their side lines and the Atchafalaya.

"The above-described tract"—

I hope the honorable Senator will pay particular attention to this, as he depends upon this decision—

"is a portion of the grant made in 1713 by the Western Company to Paris Duvernay"

They confirmed a portion of that grant, but the bill that was passed at the last session gives to these heirs the entire grant that was made to Paris Duvernay—

"settled for him in 1719 by Dubuisson and sixty other men, and sold in 1765 by Claude Tremanay de Chamfret, the agent of the said Paris Duvernay, to the said Bernard Dauterive. The portion now claimed is so much of the said original grant as was confirmed to the said Bernard Dauterive by the Spanish Governors O'Reilly and Unzaga, and this claim is made without prejudice to the rights of the claimants to other lands under the said original grant by the Western Company. We are, therefore, of opinion that this claim ought to be confirmed."

The register and receiver confirmed to the heirs of Dauterive the tract of land that was granted by the Spanish Government to Dauterive, while the bill of last session gives to these heirs the tract that was granted to Paris Duvernay. This decision expressly says that it confirms only a part of the Duvernay grant, and that part is a tract of forty-four arpents up and down the Mississippi river, and extending back to the Atchafalaya river; so that they confirmed a tract of land forty acres wide instead of twelve miles wide, which makes a considerable difference, in my judgment, in the amount of land. The district court made the same decision. The district court did not confirm the claim of the Duvernay grant, but confirmed to these heirs the claim that was allowed to them by the Spanish Governor, Unzaga. They confirmed to these heirs a tract of land forty arpents wide on the Mississippi river, and extending back to the Atchafalaya, instead of a tract of land twelve miles wide on the Mississippi river and extending back to the Atchafalaya, as this bill of last session allowed.

Now, sir, I will refer to the decision of the court to show that I am not mistaken. The court proceeded to recite the grant to Duvernay, and then said:

"And being further satisfied that after the transfer of the said Province of Louisiana by France to Spain, under the treaty made between the two Governments on the 3d of November, 1763, Don Luis Andry, surveyor general of the said Province of Louisiana, acting under the authority of Don Louis de Unzaga y Amezaga, Governor of the said Province under the Government of Spain, did, on the 12th day of March, 1772, make a survey of a portion of the said tract comprised in the aforesaid grant acquired by the said Jean Antoine Bernard Dauterive from Duvernay, having forty-four arpents front on the right bank of the Mississippi river, with the side lines opening and extending to the Atchafalaya, as is represented and described in the plat and process-verbal of said survey on file and marked 'B. No. 21'; and that, on the 12th day of July, 1772, the said Unzaga, Governor of said Province aforesaid, did approve the said survey conformably to the plan and process-verbal of survey of the said Andry, surveyor as aforesaid, with the depth to the Atchafalaya as shown by the letter of the said Unzaga attached to the said survey and marked 'B. No. 22'; and that the same was a recognition and confirmation of the title of the said Jean Antoine Bernard Dauterive, who was then a resident of the said Province of Louisiana, to the land represented and described in the said plat and process-verbal of survey, with the depth between the side lines to the Atchafalaya river, or a grant anew of the same by the said Governor, having full power and authority to grant the same, and that a portion of said tract fronting on the Mississippi river to the depth of forty arpents from said river, and no more, was disposed of to the Spanish Government or otherwise by the heirs after the death of the said Dauterive."

"And being further satisfied that the petitioners are the heirs and legal representatives of the said Jean Antoine Bernard Dauterive," &c.

It then proceeds:

"The heirs and legal representatives of the said Jean Antoine Bernard Dauterive are the true and legal owners of, and have good title against the United States, the defendants in and to the lands claimed in their petition, granted as aforesaid to Paris Duvernay, and afterward confirmed as aforesaid to the said Jean Antoine Bernard Dauterive by the Spanish Government, having forty-four arpents front on the Mississippi river, and extending in depth to the Atchafalaya river."

That was the decree of the court, confirming to these heirs a tract of land having a front of forty-four arpents on the Mississippi river and extending back to the Atchafalaya. That case was taken to the Supreme Court. Now as to the decision of the register and receiver, I will say that it was reversed by the Solicitor of the Treasury, and his opinion is here. The claim, as allowed by the register and receiver, was repudiated by the Solicitor of the Treasury.

Mr. STEWART. How much land was granted running along the river?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Forty-four arpents along the river.

Mr. STEWART. And running back how far?

Mr. WILLIAMS. To the Atchafalaya river.
Mr. STEWART. How much would that be?
Mr. WILLIAMS. It would be forty acres.
Mr. STEWART. But how far would it run back from the river?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Forty acres front and running back twelve miles.

Mr. SHERMAN. An arpent is not an acre.
Mr. WILLIAMS. It is something like an acre.

Mr. HENDERSON. Fifty-nine yards.
Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, sir, it appears that all the decisions that have heretofore been made on this subject in favor of these heirs have only been to the extent or effect of allowing to them a tract of land forty-four arpents front on the Mississippi river, and extending back twelve miles to the Atchafalaya river, and those decisions have been reviewed and disapproved. The decision of the register and receiver has been disapproved by the Solicitor of the Treasury; and that made by the district court, by the Supreme Court, notwithstanding it is true that the case was dismissed in point of fact in the Supreme Court, because the district court had not jurisdiction.

It has been said that reports have been made favorable to this claim by committees of the House and by committees of the Senate. I have the report here of Mr. NOELL, to which reference has been made, and I have the bill that was reported by Mr. NOELL to the House; and I ask the attention of the honorable Senator from Maryland to that bill. It shows that this claim, since Mr. NOELL reported his bill, has grown from a tract of land of a few thousand acres up to one containing about half a million acres. Here is the bill of Mr. NOELL:

"Mr. NOELL, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported the following bill:
"A bill for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Jean A. B. Dauterive."

Be enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the claim of the heirs and legal representatives of Jean Antoine Bernard Dauterive, late of Louisiana, to a certain tract of land in said State, having forty-four arpents front on the Mississippi river and extending in depth to the Atchafalaya river, bounded above by a line beginning on the Mississippi river," &c.

That is the bill reported by Mr. NOELL, accompanied by a report upon which the honorable Senator relies. The bill of Mr. NOELL only proposes to allow to these heirs a tract of land forty-four arpents front on the Mississippi river, and extending back to the Atchafalaya river; but by some hocus-pocus this claim has grown, under the manipulations of committees, from a claim containing perhaps eight or ten thousand acres of land up to one of half a million. The bill that was passed at the last session proposes to give to the heirs of Louis Bouligny seventy-five thousand acres of land as one sixth of the trust, assuming that the original grant to Duvernay had been recognized by all these prior decisions. It is the most astonishing blunder that I have ever known to be committed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no proof that he is the only heir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is assumed among the papers without any specific evidence on the subject, further than the finding of the district court.

Now, sir, this report that was made at the last session by Mr. Thayer refers to the decision of the register and receiver, and to the decision of the district court, as allowing to these heirs the whole tract of twelve miles each way that was granted to Duvernay, when both decisions on their face show that neither tribunal recognized any claim broader on the Mississippi river than forty-four arpents, instead of twelve miles.

It is upon these grounds that the committee are of the opinion that the bill passed at the last session ought to be suspended. We do not undertake to decide at this time that the heirs of Louis Bouligny may not be entitled to one sixth of the land contained in a tract forty-four arpents front on the Mississippi river and extending back to the Atchafalaya river. That point we do not at this time decide; but the committee are clearly of the opinion that there is no evidence anywhere, no decision anywhere, entitled to any respect, that gives to the heirs of Dauterive a tract of land twelve miles broad on the Mississippi river and extending back twelve miles to the Atchafalaya river.

Reference has been made to the acts of the Spanish Governor as acts of cruelty and oppression; but, sir, I will ask if the United States ever undertook to indemnify the old French citizens of Louisiana for the oppressive acts of the Spanish Governor who succeeded, after that territory was transferred by France to Spain, to the administration of public affairs? Has the Government ever assumed to do anything of that kind? When these Spanish Governors came there they found this country shingled over with these immense claims, covering miles and leagues, and in order to promote the prosperity of the country, and to fill it with people and extend agriculture, they reduced these immense claims to reasonable proportions; and they reduced this claim of twelve miles in extent each way to one of much less dimensions; and I say the grant to Duvernay has never since been recognized by any Government, by the Spanish, by the American, or by any Government. It is a grant of the existence of which there is no evidence except in historical allusions; a grant the exact location of which nobody can define; the boundaries of which nobody can describe; a tract of land that has never been bounded or described by any surveyor, and of which there has never been a plat made so far as I can learn from these proceedings.

Without occupying more time, I will simply say that while the committee do not decide that the heirs of Louis Bouligny may not be entitled to one sixth of this tract of forty-four arpents from and extending back to Atchafalaya river, it is perfectly clear that they are not entitled to that tract which was originally granted to Duvernay by the Mississippi Company; and as the bill that was passed at the last session recognizes their right to that entire tract, it is the opinion of the committee that the operation of that bill should be suspended. To allow that bill to be carried into effect would rob this Government of an immense amount of land, because the bill of the last session only provides for one sixth of the claim. There are five subsequent similar claims to come forward, amounting to half a million acres of land. To allow that bill to be executed would be to work a great wrong upon the Government, and would be recognizing a claim that is not founded in law or in justice.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member is right in supposing that I relied upon the judgment of the register and receiver and of the courts and of Congress; and I supposed that they all related to a title that would embrace the number of acres of which seventy-five thousand acres would be one sixth. He is, therefore, right now in correcting me so far as relates to the judgment of the register and receiver and the opinion of the committee of which Mr. NOELL was the chairman; but he is not right so far as relates to the report made by Mr. Thayer; he is not right in relation to one or two of the bills which I understand have been passed by each branch. I can imagine why it was that Mr. NOELL and the district judge confined their judgment to the one sixth, or to the amount which was claimed under the Spanish recognition of the title. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the opinion to which I have referred, as given by Mr. Justice Nelson, were clear in believing that if there were any evidence at all satisfactory to that tribunal to show the existence of the French grant, it would be incumbent upon the United States to recognize it; and Mr. Justice Nelson seeks to avoid the claim as made under the French grant upon the ground of the want of evidence of the existence of that grant, and upon no other ground. He evidently was of opinion—and in that I have no doubt he was right—that if the claimants could show a French grant such as they had alleged, the United States would be bound to recognize it, notwithstanding Spain had disavowed it in part; and for very obvious reasons, as I think, to those who will reflect at all upon the law of nations in relation to that subject.

When Spain became the grantees of the territory by the cession from France in 1762, they were bound to recognize all the antecedent grants made by France; and their failure to recognize, if they did fail to recognize, this grant in its entirety, was a wrong upon the grantees who held the French title. Now, we take the place of Spain; we have become the grantees of this land under Spain; and if Spain was bound and held the territory under the obligation to recognize the French grant, I say, with all becoming confidence, we are bound to recognize it. Every one knows who is at all familiar with the law of nations on the subject that when one nation obtains by cession a territory from another, all the private claims that may exist to land in that territory fall within the protection of the successor; and being under his protection it is his duty to recognize them; and whoever takes the property from him becomes a successor to that duty. I state, therefore, very confidently, that the Supreme Court, as far as they are considered as speaking through Mr. Justice Nelson, were clearly of opinion that if the French grant in point of fact existed, the claimants were entitled to all that was covered by that grant.

Now, my friend from Oregon says that it is not known that that grant was ever located. Well, suppose it is not. Whose fault was that? Not the fault of the claimants. As long as France remained the sovereign of the territory it was her duty to segregate it from the public domain; and when, without doing it, Spain became her successor, it was Spain's duty not to interfere with that segregation. And yet what does she do? She takes possession of it violently, and then afterward agrees, or is supposed to agree, that she will recognize the claim for a part; and yet if there was any claim at all under France it was not for a part, it was for the whole. The conduct, therefore, of Spain in recognizing it only in reference to a part, while it recognizes it as a title derived from France, while it establishes the existence of the French grant, clearly establishes a wrong on the part of Spain.

But however that may be, the amendment which I propose is to let the act we have already passed fall altogether unless both branches of Congress shall hereafter say that it ought to be allowed, and I therefore move that amendment, that instead of making the operation of the law that we have passed depend upon the order of Congress, it shall stand or fall just as Congress may hereafter repeal or not repeat the grant or modify it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I simply wish to say as to that amendment that I do not think it ought to be adopted for the reason that if these heirs have any claim to any land there it must be a distinct claim for a portion of another and a separate tract of land, and when they present that claim, if the operation of the bill is suspended, it can be considered as a distinct application for another appropriation. But if the bill is simply suspended until the end of the next session, it may possibly be forgotten or overlooked; there may be some difficulty in getting the matter before Congress, and the claim may be finally satisfied when it is apparent as it seems that it ought not to be satisfied. I do not think that by passing the resolution in its present form we embarrass the claim of the heirs in any way.

Mr. JOHNSON. The result, then, is that although the Senate of the United States may be perfectly satisfied, or are now or shall in the end be perfectly satisfied, that the claim is a just one and ought to be allowed, we cannot allow it without the consent of the other House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true of every claim.

Mr. JOHNSON. But we have allowed this now, and the only question is as to its suspension. If you want it suspended to enable us to examine into the propriety of passing that bill, put it in a form that will leave the bill in our power.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the amendment will be adopted. It appears that there is some claim, if it is only an undivided sixth portion of the eleven thousand acres. I do not think the committee have adopted the exact way to compensate them for that, giving lands and estimating them by acres. There may, perhaps, have been a mistake in that. I think if the Government of the United States has taken their land and appropriated it, the fair way would be to ascertain its value, whatever there may be of it, and pay for it. But if the Senate pass this resolution, with the preamble, asserting that the claim is a fraudulent one—

Mr. WILLIAMS. The preamble has been stricken out.

Mr. JOHNSON. But there is no other reason given for this action.

Mr. STEWART. I think to pass it in this shape would prejudice the case. If we postpone the operation of the law until after the next session, I think there will be no difficulty in the Committee on Private Land Claims ascertaining the exact nature of the claim; and on the report of the committee we can act at the next session. I believe there will be no difficulty in disposing of the subject then. I am certain the members of that committee will not forget it. But I fear that the passage of the resolution now in this shape will prejudice the claim. I hope the amendment will be adopted; and then at the next session we can pass such a measure as will be just.

Mr. FERRY. I trust as a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims that this amendment may not be adopted. The bill as it passed at the last session is palpably a very gross injustice to the United States; and at this session we ought not to leave a possibility that that bill shall at any future time be executed. The matter involved is not simply the seventy-five thousand acres of land which are given to the heirs of John E. Bouligny, but it involves the establishment of the liability of the Government of the United States to pay an amount exceeding half a million of dollars to the heirs of Dauterive; and so long as this bill stands unsuspended and unrepealed that liability of the Government exists, and the representatives of the remaining heirs of Dauterive may present their claim, and, relying upon the acknowledgment and establishment by Congress of the liability of the Government to them, successfully prosecute it before Congress. All the facts in this case have been so completely detailed by the chairman of the committee that I think it is not necessary for me to recapitulate them again.

The difficulty from the beginning has been this: that while the claimants have only asked for one sixth part of the Spanish grant, embracing a few thousand acres, the committee of the last session, by a very gross error, which is to me perfectly inexplicable, have adopted as the basis of their action an old, undetermined, and invalid French grant which no court has ever recognized, no officer of the Government has ever recognized, which Congress has always repudiated; and recognizing that old French grant have upon that basis proceeded to establish the liability of the Federal Government to pay over this enormous amount to the heirs of Bernard Dauterive.

Now, if the amendment is adopted, the result is simply that which has been briefly stated: if in the hurry of legislation next winter, or from any other cause, the matter slips by the session, the Treasury is robbed, clearly, unequivocally robbed of an amount in value exceeding $500,000; whereas, on the other hand, if the execution of the bill of last session is suspended until the committee before whom the papers now are shall have an opportunity fairly and finally to adjust this claim, no injury can happen to the Government; no injury can happen to the claimants under the bill, because that to which they are really entitled, if entitled to anything, (which I very much doubt,) will be given to them by the report of the committee at the ensuing session; and the fact that Congress has been willing to grant them something upon their claim at a former session will be a strong cause for the passage of anything which the committee at the next session may report as being that to which the claimants are fairly entitled under the old Spanish grant. I think if the amendment is adopted there is danger of gross injustice to the Government. I think if the resolution as it came to us from the House, now that the preamble is stricken out, shall be adopted, no injury can be done to any one, but justice will probably be administered to all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland.

The amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in. The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill amendatory of the bankrupt act.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to understand the situation of that bill. I believe it has never been referred to any committee, but simply introduced for reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I inquire of the Chair if it is so situated that it can be taken up by a vote of the Senate, or whether it requires unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is under the control of the Senate, in the opinion of the Chair. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CONKLING. Is a motion in order now to commit that bill to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking it up. If it is taken up it will then be in order.

The motion of Mr. TRUMBULL was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 95) to amend the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867.

Mr. CONKLING. I now move that this bill be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the bill was introduced it was informally considered by the committee. There can be no object whatever in recommitting it except to defeat it. If the Senator from New York desires to do that he may as well meet it directly. There is nothing, I presume, in the wording of the bill that needs any consideration by a committee. It consists of two sections, and is in print on the tables of Senators. The first section proposes to repeal that clause of the law which requires the appointment of registers of bankruptcy to be made by the judges of the district courts upon the nomination and recommendation of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. I desire to understand the statement made by the Senator in regard to the consideration of this bill by the committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I stated that the bill had been informally considered in the committee before it was introduced into the Senate, and that there could be no object in the reference of it to a committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I desire to inquire whether the Senator means us to understand that it was favorably considered by the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not state whether it was favorably or unfavorably considered. I stated that it had been informally considered, and that there was no object in referring it. I do not know how a majority of the committee would vote upon it. It was not before us for the purpose of voting. I presume, however, it would have the assent of a majority of the committee, but I do not know how that is; no vote was taken upon it; nor do I think it material.

The second section provides that it shall be the duty of the several district courts of the United States to appoint these registers. The bill simply relieves the Chief Justice from this very unpleasant and burdensome duty. It will be remembered, perhaps, that when the bankrupt bill was under consideration at the last session of Congress, the Committee on the Judiciary, of which the Senator from New York was not then a member, reported in favor of striking out this clause at that time in the bill as it came from the House, and devolving the duty upon the district courts, so that this measure had the sanction of the Judiciary Committee at the last session of Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senate did not adopt it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senate, however, refused to concur. I think there was a tie vote in the Senate on that question. I have now introduced a bill to repeal that clause of the law, and the question is for the Senate to determine whether it will relieve the Chief Justice from this burdensome duty. Clearly he cannot have the necessary information to determine who are proper registers in bankruptcy for the various districts in the remote States of the Union. He is not furnished with a clerk to examine the papers that are sent to him, and I understand that the mail comes loaded with recommendations from most of the districts in the United States in favor of different persons. He has no clerks at his hand to assort these papers and arrange them and make what is called a brief of the various recommendations; and if he is to discharge this duty he ought to have some assistance.

Then there is another objection which is worthy of consideration. It is certainly questionable whether the law itself is constitutional. The Constitution of the United States authorizes Congress to vest the appointment of inferior officers in the President alone, in the heads of Departments, or in the courts of law. Now, it is competent in Congress to vest this power of appointment in the courts of law, in the district courts; but it is not competent under the Constitution to vest it in the Chief Justice. He is not a court. He is the presiding officer of one of the courts, the Supreme Court of the United States. The law does not give to the district courts the appointment of these officers, as the Constitution authorizes Congress to do; but it gives them authority on the nomination of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States to make the appointments. In other words, it makes the district courts hold the same relation to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States that the Senate holds to the President of the United States. Who appoints officers of this Government? Does the Senate do it; or does the President make the appointments? We hold a negative on the President; that is all. We advise and consent to his nominations, but we can appoint nobody by ourselves. Does the Constitution of the United States confer upon Congress authority to transform a court into an advising and consenting body similar to the Senate? Clearly the Constitution does not authorize Congress to vest the appointment of inferior officers in the chief justice of any court. It may be vested in a court, but not in the chief justice, unless the chief justice should constitute the whole court; and then it would be because vesting it in him is the same thing as vesting it in the court. But, sir, whether it be constitutional or not, I think it very impolitic, and it is imposing upon the Chief Justice an unnecessary and burdensome duty, which he ought not to be called upon to perform. In my judgment this bill ought to pass.

Mr. CONKLING. I took the liberty of inquiring of the Senator from Illinois whether he intended the Senate to infer that this bill had been in any sense favorably considered by the Judiciary Committee, because I thought from his remark his understanding or recollection was different from my own as to what took place. My recollection is, that there was an expression of opinion in the Judiciary Committee, and that that expression was very decided against the propriety of introducing this bill; and I asked the question, thinking that the Senator's recollection was different in that respect from my own. The members of the Judiciary Committee are here, and they doubtless will know whether the Senator is right in his recollection or whether it is not correct upon that point.

I wish to say that this particular point was considered very carefully and discussed very earnestly in the House of Representatives on more than one occasion. The provision as it stands was not a rambling provision, nor one inserted without what was deemed very sufficient reason. I think that every gentleman who knows anything about the judgment of the other House upon this matter will agree with me that it is entirely out of the question to pass, during this session or at any session, such an amendment to the law as that which is now proposed. There is another section of the bankrupt bill which some gentlemen have been giving their attention to, an amendment of which might have a better chance than this; but if repeated votes, votes which at times defeated the bill without this provision, are any evidence of the judgment of men, it is entirely clear that no such provision as this could be passed in the other House.

Now, Mr. President, one word as to the onus which it imposes on the Chief Justice. I dissent entirely from the statement made by the Senator from Illinois on that point. Nobody, I take it, supposed that the Chief Justice was to go in person or in any way to exercise visitatorial functions in all the localities from which these registers are to be taken. On the contrary, the expectation was that as the practice is in reference to selecting persons for the highest official trusts, so the usage would be in regard to these officials; that the Chief Justice, in reference to the State of Ohio, for instance, would call to his aid the Senators and Representatives from that State, although it is his own State, and learn from them the qualifications and the merits of the applicants in each particular locality; which would lead to the presentation to him of recommendations by persons known to him, and the making of such statements as would satisfy him of the propriety of making particular nominations. That was the view with which this particular provision was inserted in the law; and I confess that I for one see no difficulty whatever in its being carried out now; and I cannot believe that the selection of all these registers would occupy more than two days by any plan of selection, however careful it may be that he may adopt, unless he should choose to discard altogether the information he could get from Senators and Representatives, and go into the investigation of miscellaneous recommendations coming from people known and those unknown.

As to the constitutionality of the provision as it passed, which I understand to be simply that these appointments shall be made by the district judges, but selected from the persons nominated by the Chief Justice, I will say that the special committee having the bankrupt bill in charge in the other House, which was composed in part of lawyers of conceded ability, considered, and so did the lawyers of the House, that there was no question about it; and I know that some of the lawyers of the country with whose standing we are all very familiar, and who have considered this question more recently, have no doubt whatever upon the point. I have only to add in that regard that I shall deem it very unfortunate if any question shall be raised, by the action of Congress or otherwise, as to the constitutionality of the provision. I can see how it might disquiet and unsettle and disturb those who are interested in the measure, and I cannot see how it can have any other effect.

I hope this bill will be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, so that if upon examination they find that it is really wise to attempt the change now, we may have the judgment of the committee to that effect, and, on the contrary, if their opinion is the reverse, that we may have the benefit of that.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Chief Justice very naturally, I think, is exceedingly unwilling, if he can be made constitutionally, to discharge this duty. I have not seen him, nor have I heard directly from him; but from what I have heard I doubt very much whether, he will perform the duty; and what I wish to suggest is, that if he does fail to perform it perhaps the law will fail altogether. We might of course have left the selection of registers to the district courts, but we have not done that. By the law as it stands they have no authority to appoint a register without a nomination by the Chief Justice. The appointing power, therefore, which we have conferred on the district courts is with the two combined, just as is the appointing power in the President and the Senate. Neither has it altogether, and neither can exercise it alone. My fear, therefore, is that if the Chief Justice, either because he thinks we have no right to impose the duty upon him or because it will interfere with his other judicial duties, will not perform this duty, the law may fail altogether.

I repeat I have no knowledge except what I hear in the way of rumor; but I see it stated that he has declined acting until the Supreme Court shall be in session. I infer from that (for I cannot imagine what he desires to consult the judges of the Supreme Court upon, unless it be that) that he proposes to take the opinion of that court as to the constitutionality of this provision, and I am by no means certain that the judges will not hold that Congress have no authority to impose this duty upon any one of the judges. My recollection is that some of the original pension acts, passed soon after the organization of the Supreme Court, devolved a portion of the duty upon the judges of the circuit courts to examine into claims for pensions, and they held that that was not a judicial matter; that Congress had no authority to impose the duty on them; they might or might not discharge it; and some of them did and some did not.

My apprehension is that if he takes, as I see by the papers he means to take, the opinion of the judges of the Supreme Court on the validity of this legislation of ours, they will come to the conclusion that it is one which we had no right constitutionally to adopt, and hence he will decline to discharge the duty. Then what is to become of the bankrupt act? How are the registers to be appointed?

I know it may be said—I think the honorable member from New York suggested to me in private—that the whole effect of deciding that particular provision to be unconstitutional would be to strike that out and leave the rest of the law to stand; but I do not understand the principle upon which that suggestion was made to be the rule. If two subjects in a bill are so connected together as not to be separable in their nature, then if any portion is decided to be illegal the whole falls. Then, if I am right in thinking that this appointment, as we have conferred it, is an appointment vested in the two combined, and not intended to be vested in one, then if they shall come to the conclusion that one of the combinations is one which we had no right constitutionally to make, the other will drop; the law will fail.

I therefore concur with my friend from Illinois, the chairman of the committee, that we should make this change if we can. Now, it is said, and may be said correctly, (the honorable member from New York may predict certainly the fate of this measure,) that a provision like this, striking out the clause giving the Chief Justice the nomination, would not meet the concurrence of the other House. That is possible; but then we get clear of our obligation, as I understand it, in proposing to strike it out. If the House refuses to concur, the law stands as it is; but I do not know that the House will so act; I have no judicial notice, so to speak, that the House will so decide, and particularly when it is brought to their attention at the instance of the Chief Justice, who is very anxious, as I understand, to get clear of this particular duty. His judicial duties now, if he discharges them properly, as I have no doubt he designs to do, are sufficiently arduous. I do not know any office in the gift of the Government more important and which requires more close and exclusive attention than that of the Chief Justice of the United States or judge of the Supreme Court. I think their whole time ought to be taken in studying the great questions which they are called upon to decide, in becoming masters of jurisprudence in all its branches; and to place either of them in a position which apparently gives him political power is to injure the country and at the same time injure the judge. I am therefore very anxious to relieve him so far as I am concerned.

Mr. DIXON. When the bankrupt act was on its passage before the Senate I had very great objections to the provision vesting in part the power of appointment in the Chief Justice. I doubted its constitutionality. I agree with the Senator from Illinois that there is a very grave question as to the power; in fact I do not believe there is any power in Congress to vest the appointment in any mode in the Chief Justice as has been done. But, sir, that was not my principal objection, although that is a serious objection, and one which ought to be raised here if anywhere, although the Senator from New York thinks it ought not to be raised here. Certainly, if there is objection we ought to consider it; here is the very place to consider it in the first instance. We do not want an unconstitutional law on the statute-book upon a subject of this kind.

But, sir, my principal objection is of another character. I think the Chief Justice is not the proper man to make these selections; not that I have not perfect confidence in him; no man on this floor has greater confidence in the Chief Justice of the United States than I have; I consider him as pure and spotless as he is able; but I say this is not the proper business of any Chief Justice. I do not wish to vest in the Chief Justice of the United States political power of this kind. I, in the first place, do not wish to burden him with it; and in the second place, if I were willing to impose on him that burden, I do not think it a proper duty for him to perform. What have we seen? The rush has commenced, the testimonials are pouring in upon him with regard to these appointments, and this has already assumed a political character. It cannot be otherwise. The applicants are sending in their testimonials, not only as to their qualifications, but as to their politics. That I am informed is the case in the part of the country in which I live. Ought the Chief Justice be subjected to this? It certainly is not kind to impose upon him this duty. Therefore, as I say, while I consider him a man out of the reach of any improper influence as much as any man who ever lived, I do not wish to impose upon any Chief Justice of the United States a duty of this character. I think the law ought to be repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe that I voted against giving this power to the Chief Justice when the bankrupt bill was under consideration; but a majority of the Senate having decided to leave it there, all of us who were in favor of the general principles of the bankrupt law, including I believe my distinguished friend from Maryland, voted for the bill. Now, it is said by my friend from Maryland that he sees by the papers that the Chief Justice is about to consult his colleagues on the bench as to the constitutionality of this provision, and by implication it is—

Mr. JOHNSON. Permit me to correct the honorable member. I did not say that, certainly did not mean to say it; I said I saw he was about to consult his colleagues, and I can imagine no other purpose of consulting them except this.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well, take it so. Then the irresistible inference is that if upon such a consultation ex parte, in private, he should come to the conclusion that this provision of the law is not constitutional, he would not exercise the duty that the law imposes upon him of making these nominations. Now, in the first place, I wish to enter my protest in advance against the Chief Justice or any other citizen, be he high or low, the President of the United States or the General of the armies, or whoever he may be, undertaking to get the opinion of the Supreme Court upon any question upon a law that may come before them for consideration in advance and ex parte. And in my judgment there would be no more justification in the Chief Justice refusing to obey what this law requires him to do, after such a consultation and after such advice, than there would before, because it drives us to this alternative: we pass a law, and any officer who is required to do something under it has it in his power, on account of his official or other relations to some court, to get their individual opinions as to how they are going to hold the law, valid or invalid; and if they think they shall hold it invalid, then he nullifies it; and that is to be his justification. The practice of the Government, I believe, so far has been, and the only practice upon which Government can be securely administered, to obey the law which the law-making power passes, including the approval of the Executive—to obey and execute that law until on a proper case, with regular parties, and after fair deliberation and argument, and both sides of the controversy are contested, it shall be held to be invalid.

Now, what should we say as to any executive officer of the country, the President of the United States, for illustration, if upon doubtful and debated and disputed questions we should be told that he had privately got the opinion of the Supreme Court that such and such provisions which we had enacted into a law, either with or without his consent, would not stand, and therefore he did not choose to put them in force? Either some very serious consequences would happen to him, whoever he might be, or the Government might be entirely broken up. It is the business of the Supreme Court to decide causes, not to act as counsel even for one of their fellows; and the fact that this officer happens to be the Chief Justice is no more reason for his getting an ex parte opinion in advance than it is for any other citizen—not a particle. I do not by any means suppose that he intends to do it; I am sure he cannot intend to do it, because, to my mind, it would be exceedingly improper and unfair.

Then the question is, what are we to do? We have passed this law; we have passed it upon consideration here, against my opinion as to its propriety, and against very grave doubts that in my humble and limited knowledge of the law I have as to its constitutionality; but we tested the question in this body, and decided by a considerable majority that we would allow it to stand as it is.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A tie vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Illinois says it was a tie. No matter; a majority decided to leave it as it is. I wished it to be otherwise; I wish it were otherwise now; but if we go into the consideration of questions of this sort over and over again at the same session, when they have been before fully considered, merely because we impose an inconvenient and disagreeable duty upon some officer, we shall never have any end of such things, and the country will be worse off than before. I take it, my friend from Maryland will agree and my friend from Illinois will agree, I have no doubt, that if these registers are appointed and proceed to exercise the functions of their office, their acts will be held to be valid as between the bankrupt and his creditors, although the court on some case made may hereafter decide that the appointment was not regularly made. I believe the principle of law to be clearly admitted by everybody that the title of an officer to the office he holds—and that is this question—cannot be contested in a suit inter partes where he merely acts as between them. In a suit against him these registers might run some risk if they had any power, to harm anybody and the question could be raised; so that no great injury will result even if it should be ultimately held that these appointments ought not to have been made in that way.

Therefore, while I agree that it ought to be otherwise, and voted that it should be otherwise, the House by a large majority and the Senate by some majority have decided recently to leave it as it is. I think, then, we should only do injury to the public rather than good if we undertook to disturb it. These are my reasons for voting against on this particular question what under other circumstances I would be glad to vote for.

Mr. DIXON. I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont a question which he is competent to answer. Suppose the register were appointed illegally, and that were admitted; suppose the law provided that this important officer, register in bankruptcy, should be appointed by the mayor of Washington, who is acknowledged to have no power whatever over the subject, who could not be vested with power to make the appointments—in a case like that I ask the Senator whether there would not be a question as to the validity of the certificate of discharge granted to a bankrupt by a register so appointed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly there would be a question, because you can scarcely state a case in which there will not be a question; but I will state in answer, to my friend with entire frankness for his benefit, though I do not usually give opinions gratis, that in my opinion a certificate of discharge granted under those circumstances would be valid, because the question of the validity of the certificate of discharge must necessarily and exclusively arise, so far as the bankrupt and his creditors are concerned, in a suit by some creditor to enforce payment of a balance of some old debt notwithstanding the certificate, and in such a suit, in my opinion, the court would not go into an inquiry—I believe the decisions are uniform on that point—as to the rightfulness of the appointment of the officer holding the office that he professed to hold. I think that if the register were de facto a register, the question as to whether he were de jure such or not could not be considered.

Mr. SHERMAN. The proposition now is to relieve the Chief Justice from a very unpleasant and onerous duty. Before I make one or two observations on that point, I desire to answer the objection made to this proposition.

The Senator from Vermont objects that it shows a kind of inconsistency or uncertainty in our legislation that we are now asked to undo what we have done so recently. With the example just before us of the repeal of a law which passed the Senate by a unanimous vote of the body, it is scarcely necessary to pay much attention to an admonition of that kind. The bill we have just repealed was, I think, passed a short time ago without a division.

Mr. HENDERSON. Oh, no. The yeas and nays were called upon it, and the vote was 39 to 10.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then it was passed by the Senate by a vote of three to one, after a statement made by the Senator who had it in charge; and now we repeal it with scarcely any contest. We are doing that all the time. The proposition which it is now proposed to repeal only failed of being stricken out of the bankrupt bill by a tie vote.

The Senator from New York says the House of Representatives will not agree to this measure. It seems to me that argument is rather too often used here. If the House of Representatives will not agree to it there is no harm done by our passing it, and we shall have done our duty by sending it there. I think it is not right, though we constantly do it, and I often do it myself, to say here what the House will do or will not do. We ought to act upon the questions that come before us on their merits, and let the other House act according to its judgment and on its responsibility. That is undoubtedly the parliamentary rule, though we all violate it to some extent.

Now, what is the real character of this proposition? It proposes to relieve the Chief Justice from the duty of nominating registers in bankruptcy. The number of registers is not fixed. By law they cannot be less than one for each congressional district, and consequently they cannot be less than about two hundred and forty; and they may be ten thousand, because there is no limit in the law. There may be just as many registers as the courts choose to appoint; but there cannot be less than two hundred and forty. The Chief Justice has no power to appoint these registers. The Constitution does not give him the power, nor enable us to give him the power, because he is not a court. The district courts may exercise that power; but we say in our law that before the district courts shall exercise the power the Chief Justice shall nominate, so that the truth is that we require the appointment to be made by the Chief Justice, and it is indirectly violating the Constitution.

But waiving that question for a moment, look at it as a matter of expediency. Is it right for us to require an appointment to be made upon the nomination of a person who has no right to appoint? I say it is not. Now, what is the result? The result is that the Chief Justice is overrun, and has been from the date of the passage of the bankrupt law, with applications without number. I have not seen him since the passage of the bankrupt law; but I have sent to him myself not less than fifty letters containing applications to be nominated as registers in bankruptcy, and I have no doubt my colleague has done the same, and so, probably, has every Senator. The result is that he has to examine a voluminous correspondence, because when he opens a letter he cannot tell whether it relates to an application to be a register or to some important private business of his own. He must examine these letters, and not only that, but he is now—at least I am informed from the best authority—that he is overrun by visitors who, having no knowledge of the precious character of his time, prevent him from performing the ordinary functions of his office as Chief Justice, so that he has no time to write opinions. He has to deny himself to everybody in order to prevent the invasion of his time. This is what I am informed; I have not seen him myself.

The Senator from New York thinks this duty can all be done in two days. If the Chief Justice had nothing to do except to go and see the members or call on the members he might prepare lists in two days; but the people would not be satisfied with that. Every man who wants to be a register in bankruptcy thinks his application more important than anything else, and he wishes to see the Chief Justice. If he sees one person he cannot deny himself to others. Then if we go and recommend persons to him he must hear us patiently. If the member from the district and the Senator from the State disagree, he must hear a controversy between them. The result is, that although the duty itself might properly be discharged if he was at liberty to take up the matter and dispose of it as he can the docket of his court, and do it promptly, yet when he is compelled to hear all sorts of representations, to read all these letters, to go into the examination of the recommendations of the various persons suggested as registers, it does impose upon him a duty which is totally inconsistent with his office; a duty which we know from the nature of it is unpleasant and obnoxious. It compels him to deal out patronage when he should not have anything to do with it. There is no necessity for bringing him in contact thus with Senators and Representatives to settle controversies between them.

In accordance with the vote I have always given on this question—for I have always voted against giving the nomination to the Chief Justice—I am in favor of this bill. I am willing to confer the power to appoint registers upon the district courts who have to pass upon their doings. These registers are mere aids to the judges of the district courts. They prepare the schedules and designate the forms, and to a great extent act as commissioners or masters in chancery under the practice of many of the States. They are mere aids to the district courts, and it seems to me they ought to be appointed by the district courts. It is true that in some cases the district judges are not men who agree with us in political opinions, and perhaps not very good men always, and they may not appoint such persons as we would like to have; at the same time they are the best persons who can be constitutionally designated to make these appointments, because these registers are their aids, and it is right that the district courts should have the power to designate men in whose judgment they have confidence to discharge this duty. The courts can remove them when they do not discharge properly the duty imposed on them by law. Besides, the proper making of these appointments requires local information which the district judge must necessarily have. The lawyers from all parts of his district practice before him, and he would know best who to appoint, he would know best the character of mind of the various lawyers of the district.

This is an important consideration, I know, from the number of applications that are sent to me from all parts of the State of Ohio, and, indeed, from all parts of the United States, for I have had at least a dozen applications from the city of New York, from men whom I do not know, urging strongly that such and such a person be appointed register of bankruptcy. As a matter of course I can do nothing except to send the letters to the gentleman who has the power to appoint. He is compelled to read them; they go to him under my frank. So with all of us. He is compelled to read an application from some one in New York through me to be appointed register in bankruptcy. It seems to me that this is a duty which we ought to relieve him from and relieve him promptly.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think this is a very clear question. By the Constitution Congress is authorized to vest the appointment of certain subordinate officers in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments. Under the bankrupt bill, as passed by the Senate and agreed to by the House of Representatives, the appointment of registers in bankruptcy instead of being vested in the courts of law, were vested in the head of the Supreme Court, the Chief Justice. I understand that he feels burdened by the duty charged upon him by the existing law. The present bill is to remove from him that burden and to vest these appointments in the district courts, of which these registers are really officers. I think there can be no question that we should assent to the view which he holds, and which the Constitution obviously requires, that the appointments shall be made by the courts of law and not by a particular judge. I am, therefore, in favor of the bill. I consider the provision in the bankrupt bill as passed confining the appointment of these officers to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court a violation of the Constitution, while the present bill conforms to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Vermont I think is mistaken when he says that the Chief Justice would be guilty of what he imagines to be a dereliction of duty if he should, as I supposed he might, consult the judges of the Supreme Court on the constitutionality of this clause. I do not see it in that light. If he doubts whether the law is valid as far as it concerns him, why should he not consult those in whom he has entire confidence? He does not consult them as a court. He consults them just as I would consult the honorable member from Vermont if I doubted upon a legal question; and it is very often done. It has been done more than once, I know, by that tribunal in former times; but it never was supposed to be obnoxious to the slightest censure for a judge of the Supreme Court to consult his brethren upon a question of law which was to be before him, either individually or as a court.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a different question.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; if we have put this power upon him at all it is as the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But to perform an executive duty.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, suppose he thinks it an executive duty and you have no right to impose an executive duty on him, and he is not satisfied and he wants to be satisfied; he wants to discharge it if he is satisfied that Congress had a right to impose it upon him. He does not wish to conflict with the opinion of Congress unless he is very clear, and in order to be clear he proposes, if he does propose it—I do not know that he does—to take the opinion of his brethren whether in their judgment that duty can be properly imposed upon him.

The honorable member from Vermont also said that if the registers are appointed by the district court in fact, the validity of that appointment cannot be inquired into collaterally in a suit instituted by the register as register. Now, in the first place, I think that is not altogether sound; but supposing it to be sound, that does not get rid of the difficulty which I suggested. Suppose the judges of the district courts think that they have no power to appoint without the nomination of the Chief Justice, and he does not nominate them, will not appoint—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then they nullify the law.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; they do not nullify the law at all. We nullify the law by not putting it in their power constitutionally to execute the law. Does the honorable member suppose the district courts would assume a power not granted? The presumption is that they would not; and if, therefore, they should come to the opinion that they have no authority under the law as it stands to appoint registers without the nomination of the Chief Justice, they will not appoint. Then the law ceases to operate practically.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Their duty in that respect is not a duty to try and determine some question, but it is a duty to do a particular thing that the law imposes upon them. We do not submit any judicial discretion or judicial duty to them at all. It is a particular act which the law requires them to do. My proposition is, that that being the nature of the thing, because the person upon whom this duty is imposed happens to be the judge of a court, he has no more right to decide in advance "this law is not constitutional, and therefore I will not do anything about it" than any other citizen has. And if a district judge takes the responsibility of refusing to do an act imposed upon him to do, he takes the same responsibility with any other citizen, and must take the consequences.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member is mistaken. We impose it on them as a court.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But we do not leave any discretion.

Mr. JOHNSON. As a court they are to act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not a judicial duty.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is quasi judicial. You give them jurisdiction over the question of bankruptcy, and everything connected with the discharge of that duty is quasi judicial; but if they come to the opinion that they have no authority to execute the law so far as the appointment of registers is concerned, unless the Chief Justice nominates them, they will not appoint.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend says it is quasi judicial. It is no more judicial—quasi or otherwise—than any other executive duty or other actual duty that is imposed upon a court to do something. The deciding of a cause is a judicial duty. The proceeding to hear it is a duty not judicial. If the judge refuses to proceed to hear a cause, a higher court by mandamus compels him to go on; and yet my friend will agree that a judge could not be compelled by mandamus to decide one way or the other.

Mr. JOHNSON. Unquestionably not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. For the reason that it is his duty to go forward and hear the cause; not in the sense of being called upon to decide one thing or another, but to do, to proceed, to act; and therefore the proceeding to act is not a judicial duty or quasi judicial in the sense in which I am now considering the term.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, if the honorable member supposes there is any distinction between such a case as he mentions and the case I supposed to exist I think he is mistaken. We deal with them as a court in the bill. The honorable member gets clear of the objection that they have no right to decide as a court in relation to the obligation to do what we impose upon them as a court, by saying that we only ask them to do as a court what we would have the authority to ask any individual to do as a citizen. That is a great mistake. You have no power to direct the courts of the United States to do any act not in accordance with their official duties as a court. Otherwise you might burden them to the extent of destroying them altogether and compel them to resign. Their duties are under the Constitution of the United States strictly judicial.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Constitution gives us express authority to impose on them this executive duty, of the appointment of any officer we choose.

Mr. JOHNSON. It gives you authority to impose it upon them as a court. That is what I mean to say. Then you have imposed on them the duty as a court; and if, as a court, they have no power to execute this law, because the Chief Justice is connected with them in the exercise of the power of appointment and he refuses to act, they will say they will not act, and thus they will not execute the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be, but they are like anybody else then.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should be very glad indeed to relieve the Chief Justice of this burden that has been imposed upon him, and would vote to do so if I did not believe that the effort would result in nothing. I have no trouble about the constitutional question. The appointment made in terms by the district court, and the fact that it is made upon the nomination of the Chief Justice, does not render that appointment invalid in my judgment. You might just as well say that requiring the appointment to be made by the court from among a distinct class of people, as lawyers, would make it invalid. You can limit them if you choose to do so. The district court is not obliged to appoint the men named by the Chief Justice, but it may reject them, so that the appointment after all comes from the district court, though limited in the statute in a particular way.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me ask the Senator in regard to an officer required to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, can the President appoint without the consent of the Senate?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; but the language in the two cases is not the same. The constitutional provision is, that the President shall appoint by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Senate, therefore, cannot appoint without the action of the President; but in this case, although the district courts cannot appoint without the action of the Chief Justice they do appoint.

Mr. JOHNSON. The President cannot appoint without the consent of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Exactly, and it is only changing the direction. But that is a matter which it is not worth while to argue, for lawyers will have different opinions about it. I see no difficulty in the way of the provision we have enacted; and if these registers should be appointed in this way and go through with their labors, and a decree in bankruptcy should be entered, I do not think even my friend from Maryland would contend that anybody could go behind that decree to inquire as to the manner of the appointment of the register after the decree had been made. That point has been settled too often in cases somewhat similar to leave any question about it.

Notwithstanding that, the proper mode would have been undoubtedly to vest the appointment in the district courts originally, and I was in favor of it. The district courts are the courts of bankruptcy, and they should have the appointment. But that could not be done. We all understand exactly how the matter was. The House of Representatives insisted upon vesting the appointment in the circuit courts, because they did not like some of the district judges. The Senate were disposed to vest it in the district courts, or a portion of the Senate were, because they did like some of the circuit judges; and so it stood, and a compromise was made and fairly agreed upon here in the Senate that we should strike out the "circuit courts" and insert the "district courts," and leave in the bill the clause requiring the nomination of the Chief Justice. That was understood at the time, and was the only way in which the matter could be settled. Now, if we attempt to change it and send this bill to the House of Representatives, the result will be that we shall be just where we were before.

Mr. TRUMBULL. My friend from Maine, I think, is mistaken about the history of the bill. I think it came from the House just as it now stands.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; as it came from the House it provided that the appointment should be by the circuit judges.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is not my recollection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is so certainly. The House bill provided for appointing the registers by the judges of the circuit courts on the nomination of the Chief Justice. The amendment made by the Judiciary Committee was to strike out "circuit" and insert "district," and also to strike out the clause requiring the nomination of the Chief Justice; but a compromise was made as I have stated; and that compromise having been made and agreed to and the bill passed, and many members having gone home, I do not think it wise at this period of the session to change it. I have no doubt that although the duty is onerous it will be discharged by the Chief Justice if Congress, having imposed it upon him, see fit to keep it on him. I would gladly and willingly relieve him if I could, if I saw that the thing was practicable, that it could be done; but convinced as I am that any effort in that direction must fail, or that if it did not fail it will bring it back to where it stood originally, putting the power in the hands of the circuit judges, to which I am utterly opposed without any limitation, I shall vote against this bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish my friend from New York would withdraw the motion to commit to allow me to offer an amendment, so that if the bill be referred the amendment will go with it, and then the motion can be renewed.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well; I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to offer an amendment. There has been a great deal of misapprehension, and there is still a great difference of opinion, as to the time when the bankrupt law takes effect, although I believe opinions are settled down that it takes effect in some of its provisions immediately. It was certainly the understanding when the bill passed that it took effect on the 1st of June, and that was the general impression. It is certainly somewhat unfair that a measure making so great a change in commercial affairs and in credits should go into effect without any notice whatever. I offer an amendment with a view to remedy that, that the bill shall go into effect on the 1st of June.

Mr. DRAKE. I call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to the last section of the act, which covers the case.

Mr. ANTHONY. It does not cover the case, I am sorry to say. I want the amendment acted upon, and then if the bill is referred to the committee the amendment goes with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the fiftieth section of an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867, is amended so as to read as follows:

This act shall take effect on the 1st day of June next: Provided, The appointment of officers created thereby, and the establishment of rules and general orders under said act, may be made at any time after the passage of this act: And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed or held to invalidate any lien or conveyance acquired or made in good faith prior to the taking effect of this act.

Mr. CONNESS. Is that amendment now pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. Will not a motion to refer the bill and amendment to the committee be now in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be.

Mr. CONNESS. I make that motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senator to allow a vote to be taken on the amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. Why not submit it to the consideration of the committee? We have spent the entire day on this bill already.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will tell the Senator precisely why I want it done. If this amendment meets the approbation of the Senate, and the bill is referred, I shall then offer it as a separate bill. If the bill is referred, I am afraid it will not be reported again.

Mr. CONNESS. The reference of this amendment will not preclude the Senator from offering it to-morrow as a separate bill. He may offer it to-morrow and ask the Senate to consider it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I merely wish to say that I presume it is understood in the Senate that if the bill is referred there will be very little probability of any action upon it at the present session. There can be no object in referring it. It is understood in the Senate. If it is referred, it will hardly be practicable for us to report it back and consider it at the present session of Congress, which is about drawing to a close. If it is intended to pass the bill, we had better pass it without a reference.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 6) placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with others as to bounty; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

EDUCATION IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. DIXON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Education be directed to inquire into the educational interests of the District of Columbia, ascertain the condition and number of children over the age of six and under eighteen years of age, and the general efficiency of the school system now in existence therein, and report at the next session of Congress, with such suggestions of reform as he may deem necessary to provide a thorough system for the education of all the youth of the District.

CONDITION OF WOUNDED SOLDIERS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be directed to inquire and report as to the propriety of the United States becoming a party to the treaty concluded at Geneva on the 22d day of August, 1864, "for the amelioration of the condition of wounded soldiers of armies in the field," which treaty has already received the assent of the Governments of Italy, Baden, Belgium, Denmark, Holland, Spain, Portugal, France, Prussia, Saxony, Wurtemberg, and the Federal Council of Switzerland.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill, which I wish to have printed and laid upon the table. It is substantially the amendment I have just offered to the bill of the Senator from Illinois.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 106) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867; which was read twice by its title, ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

MAIL CONTRACT WITH A SENATOR.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) to terminate a contract of a member of Congress with the Post Office Department, which was to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the Postmaster General, in accordance with the usage of the Department, shall have the power to reject any bid which he may deem exorbitant.

The amendment was concurred in.

ARMS TO TENNESSEE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) directing the Secretary of War to furnish certain arms and equipments to the State of Tennessee, which was to strike out "twenty-five hundred" in line five and to insert "ten thousand."

The amendment was concurred in.

WRAPPING-PAPER.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 72) to exempt wrapping-paper made from wood or corn-stalks from internal tax, which was to add after the first Senate amendment the following:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That wrapping-paper made from any other material than that cited in the first section shall be also exempt from internal tax.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act ladders made wholly of wood shall be exempt from internal tax.

The amendment was concurred in.

INDIANA AND OHIO WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred this afternoon the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] to report another bill as a substitute for that. It takes the West Virginia and Missouri bills as a model, and adapts them to the State of Indiana and the State of Ohio. I hope there will be no objection to passing the bill now. The Senator from Indiana is very anxious to pass it, because he thinks he can get it through.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 105) to reimburse the States of Indiana and Ohio for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning military forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion, was read twice, and considered as in the Committee of the Whole. It provides for the appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of three commissioners; who are not residents of the State of Indiana, to ascertain the amount of money expended by that State in enrolling, supplying, equipping, subsisting, transporting, and paying such State forces as have been called into service in that State to act in concert with the United States forces in the suppression of the rebellion against the United States. No allowance is to be made for any troops which did not perform actual military service in full concert and co-operation with the authorities of the United States and subject to their orders; and no greater allowance is to be made for any service or expenses than would be made for similar services or expenses in the Army of the United States. The previous provisions are to apply in every respect to the State of Ohio in regard to the amount due to that State.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion of Mr. Howe was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 22, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BRYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to ask leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. BROWELL, for the remainder of this session, on account of serious illness in his father's family. And I also desire to state that my colleague has been absent from his seat in this House for the last two or three days on account of indisposition.

No objection was made, and leave of absence was accordingly granted.

ADDITIONAL EXAMINERS IN PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent of the House to have considered at this time House bill No. 23, to increase the force in the Patent Office. The passage of the bill is demanded by the condition of the business in the Patent Office at this time. The bill was framed under the supervision of the Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. SPALDING. I object; and call for the regular order of business.

RELIEF OF DESTITUTE IN THE SOUTH.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 16, for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States, which was reported with amendments from the Committee of the Whole on yesterday. The previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered on the joint resolution and pending amendments.

The first amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was to strike out of the joint resolution the following:

And that the sum of $1,000,000 be hereby appropriated from funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of the said bureau for the purchase and issue of the said supplies of food.

And insert in lieu thereof:

And to that end the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, through the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, to apply so much as he may deem necessary for the purposes aforesaid of the unexpended moneys heretofore appropriated to supply freedmen and refugees with provisions or rations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert in line five of the joint resolution after the word "classes" the words "of destitute or helpless persons."

The amendment was agreed to.

The last amendment was to add to the joint resolution the following:

Provided, That the expenditures shall not extend beyond the present appropriations already made for the Freedmen's Bureau.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was then read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. I call for the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 98, nays 81, not voting 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Archer, Baker, Banks, Barnes, Beaman, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Burr, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Coburn, Cornell, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eldridge, Ferriss, Ferry, Fox, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Holman, Asahel H. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchin, Koontz, Lincoln, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, Mercer, Miller, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pile, Plants, Poland, Polley, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Taber, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Auken, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—98.

NAYS—Messrs. Benjamin, Butler, Calkins, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Covode, Cullin, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Farnsworth, Fields, Finney, Gravely, Hopkins, Hunter, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Moore, O'Neill, Paine, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shollabarger, Thaddeus Stevens, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, and William Williams—81.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Bromwell, Cobb, Dawes, Denison, Eli, Eliot, Griswold, Harding, Hill, Hooper, Kelsey, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Loughridge, Lynch, Marshall, McClurg, McCullough, Moorhead, Morgan, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Selye, Stone, Taffe, Thomas, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wood—35.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXPENDITURES FOR ORDNANCE.

Mr. VAN WYCK asked unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution relating to expenditures for ordnance.

The joint resolution, which was read for information, provides that no more large guns or cannon of any kind shall be ordered, purchased, transported, or mounted at the cost of the United States, until it has been determined by practical experiment that guns of the largest sizes, such as are now placed on ships or forts, are capable of enduring heavy charges and of being fired rapidly; that no more projectiles, carriages, implements, or stores intended for such guns shall be paid for until the qualities of the guns shall thus be determined; that no more of the Springfield or other muskets shall be altered to breech-loaders of those which require the barrel to be lined for the purpose of reducing the caliber.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to appeal to the gentleman to allow the resolution to be introduced, and referred to the Committee on Retrenchment.

Mr. CHANLER. Why should it not be referred to the Committee on Ordnance when appointed? I understand the House has adopted a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee to take charge of this very subject. Why should the gentleman seek to anticipate in this way the action of that committee?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects to the introduction of the resolution, and it is not before the House.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move to suspend the rules that the resolution may be introduced, and referred to the Committee on Retrenchment.

Mr. CHANLER. If the resolution is to be referred I withdraw my objection to its introduction.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was introduced, read a first and second time, and referred to the joint select Committee on Retrenchment.

RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. BAKER. I have sent to the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and had referred to the Committee on Commerce a memorial and resolution of the river improvement convention held at St. Louis in February, 1867. As these papers emanate from a very important body and have reference to a great material interest, I ask that they be printed.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the documents will be ordered to be printed. There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had indefinitely postponed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 29) to extend to the employés in the quartermaster's and subsistence departments at Washington the provisions of the joint resolution giving additional compensation to certain employés in the civil service of the Government at Washington.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution and a bill of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 40) to provide for the payment of the claim of Richard Chenery; and

An act (S. No. 96) to establish a port of delivery at Chester, Pennsylvania.

HENRY A. SMYTHE.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER announced as the first business in order during the morning hour the consideration of the resolution reported yesterday from the Committee on Public Expenditures.

Mr. HULBURD. I ask whether the House is willing an amendment should be made to the resolution which I reported yesterday. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that Henry A. Smythe should be immediately removed from the office of collector of the port of New York; and that the Clerk of the House cause a certified copy of this resolution to be laid before the President of the United States.

Mr. HULBURD. I move to amend so it shall read, "the President and Senate of the United States." It will then provide that certified copies shall be laid before the Senate as well as the President.

Mr. CHANLER. Has this testimony been printed so that the members of the House have had any opportunity to revise it and see upon what this resolution has been based?

Mr. HULBURD. I do not wish to take up the time of the House, but I answer as far as this: it has not been printed except about two hundred and fifty pages, which I was able to get this morning.

I wish to say, in this action of the House, it must be borne in mind that one committee has already investigated this matter and reported in this direction. I wish also to say the present committee of this House in their committee-room had this subject under consideration, and had before them a portion of this testimony, and that, with two dissenting votes, they instructed me to report this resolution. With that explanation I ask the House to sustain the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CHANLER. This is a question of reputation, and I trust that my colleague will not press the previous question.

Mr. HULBURD. I insist on the demand.

Mr. CHANLER. It is unfair in every form.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will yield to me, I will test the sense of the House by saying Mr. Smythe shall be forthwith "impeached" instead of "removed."

Mr. HULBURD. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. CHANLER obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to move an amendment before he proceeds?

Mr. CHANLER. Certainly, sir; I yield for that purpose only.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I want to strike out the words "immediately removed" and to insert "be impeached"; and that a committee be appointed forthwith to prepare articles of impeachment."

Mr. BLAINE. The committee has already been instructed to inquire into the subject of impeachment.

The SPEAKER. That was struck out of the resolution.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move the following as a substitute for the pending resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that Henry A. Smythe, collector of the port of New York, ought to be impeached; and that the Committee on Public Expenditures proceed forthwith to prepare articles of impeachment.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, my object in taking the floor is not to enter into an argument to meet testimony which has never been published, nor to defend the character of a man who has been assailed in a committee-room in a corner of this building without knowing what the form of the assault may be. I am not going to undertake an impossible and unreasonable thing; but I have risen here to-day to arrest precipitate, unjust, and unfair legislation in the absence of an official of this Government under most serious charges. That is my sole object.

This gentleman's character is as dear to him as is that of any man's upon this floor is to him, and the more terrible the assault the more necessary it is that he should have counsel to appear for him at the bar of this House. We should not deny him all opportunity of self-defense.

I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I cannot vote for the resolution introduced by the gentleman from New York, because I look upon the appointment and removal of officers of the kind named as beyond the jurisdiction of Congress. It seems to me if we have a right to say this man ought to be removed, then certainly we have the right to name his successor and insist upon his appointment. I suggest to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HULBURD,] before calling the previous question, that he modify his resolution so as to name the successor of Mr. Smythe. I suggest also that he name Horace Greeley for the place. He will then be able to accomplish by one resolution his entire purpose, remove the incumbent and appoint such person as he may desire to hold the office. I think there can be no doubt that we have the jurisdiction to do the one as clearly as the other.

Mr. RANDALL. I think Mr. Greeley is too honest. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANLER. Infer from the excellent and admirable suggestion of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] that he has probably found out the reason of the report of the majority of this committee; for in that suggestion he has given a hint to the country of those patriotic motives which actuate that very honorable and honest committee of this House.

Sir, to assail the reputation of a man on the general charge of infamy, to drag into that charge many persons connected with the Government, directly or indirectly, male and female, and then to concentrate the spirit of the investigation in the removal of an individual, thereby carrying before the country the impression that in his guilt all connected with him are involved, is wholesale destruction of character, consistent only with such republicanism as was known in Venice, as was exercised during revolutions in Europe, or as was exhibited at the early stage of the revolution through which we have just passed in this country.

Sir, I reiterate that the malignancy of this attack, not merely upon this individual but upon certain persons whom it has deemed necessary to assail by implication, as embodied in this resolution, without being based upon one written statement seen and examined by a single member of this body, except it be the honorable member who has a portion of the printed testimony in his own hands, is altogether wrong. So far as this House is concerned, so far as the body authorized by the Constitution to inaugurate impeachment is concerned, not one word of testimony has been laid before the House in a form available for investigation or worthy of the character of an impeachment or of the dignity of the question. Even in his preliminary speech the other day the chairman of the committee, having the testimony in his hands, withheld it from the Clerk when asked to have it read.

Now, sir, I recognize in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] the proper remedy in this case. As I said at the opening of my remarks, I do not appear here either to prevent or to urge an investigation. I do not appear here to defend this man's character, but to demand in the investigation of his conduct that publicity which will be satisfactory to every member of this House and to the people we represent. I am desirous, as I before stated, of securing in the civil service of this Government a complete reform, and I believe that the custom-house organization in New York city is the very best spot in which to inaugurate that reform.

The whole question of crime, of dereliction from duty, of incapacity on the part of this public officer demands, if the gentleman can substantiate his charges, that the matter should be more than a mere personality, demands that we should establish a system which by its checks and balances will secure to the Government of the United States honest and efficient management of the revenues at our ports. I believe the amount of revenue received from foreign ports at the harbor of New York is some one hundred and thirty-eight million dollars per annum. As that system is now organized it is nothing but a political machine, to secure the proper working of which the proper man is put in the right place, with latitude of action and with responsibility enough to authorize him to work to the end of political success upon the plans laid before him by such responsible parties as are represented in national committees. By outside pressure from large political organizations, such as the Loyal League and others of that character, there is brought to bear upon the collector of the port of New York and the collector of every port in this Union, upon the head of the Internal Revenue Bureau, and of every possible machinery by which this Government is carried on, the same political pressure, whether one party or the other is in the supremacy.

Now, sir, I protest against any action against an individual without full proof and until you show a disposition to reform the whole system. I believe the present incumbent is no worse than many who preceded him. He may be no better. The amount of money that passes through his hands is to a very large extent left to himself to account for in such manner as he may please. When the hour comes for settlement he has to adjust his balances between the merchants whom he is put there to guard and to account to the Secretary of the Treasury, whom he was put there to please, or by whom he was put there to please somebody of a similar faith.

There is nothing more unfair than to put a man in a place of great temptation, and then, without giving him an opportunity of being heard, arrest him and seize his papers, or leaving him in full possession of the proof of his guilt discharge him from his office and allow him to run riot in the land with all his knowledge of means of corruption and with all the profits of his wrong-doing in his possession.

Now, if it were possible to assail the chairman of this committee [Mr. HULBURD] with the charge of being influenced by improper motives, his enemies might say there was something of collusion in this matter. And I ask this House and that gentleman and the members of the committee who acted with him to bear in mind that suppressio veri is as great a crime as suggestio falsi in the eyes of justice and equity. If you believe this man to be guilty, then produce the proof of his guilt and have him punished. If he is not guilty, then in the name of justice let him go. When a man is branded by this House there is no city of refuge to which he can flee and by a term of years wash off the stain.

By this resolution it is proposed that this House shall sink to the level of a public prosecutor, without retaining to ourselves the dignity of a judge. You are asked to seize the whip and scourge a public officer from his place, without having that warrant of justice which is the only guarantee of proper action.

Now, myself and others here find ourselves, probably for the first time upon this floor, prepared to support a proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS], because he is now acting for the purpose of securing the ends of justice, to constitutionally protect the rights of a citizen, and fortunately for us and for the country that, too, irrespective of color or race, and I believe we stand ready to support the proposition for an impeachment when testimony sufficient to warrant such action shall be brought before this House, making the case such as we can stand upon before the world, uncompromised by our action either as colluding with this officer and shielding him from justice, or as being partisan and maliciously prosecuting a man without giving him a fair trial.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. CHANLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I hope the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] looking to an impeachment, will take a different form. What has occurred in the history of this case, as I understand it, is substantially this: that one of the committees of this House was directed to investigate generally the affairs connected with the subject-matter of retrenchment, and perhaps the management of the affairs of the Government generally.

Mr. HULBURD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that the Committee on Public Expenditures of the last House were directed to investigate the affairs of the New York custom-house. The other subject to which the gentleman refers was referred to another committee.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Then I am corrected in that respect. But that does not affect the suggestion I was about to make. A committee was directed to examine into the affairs of the New York custom-house. The result of that examination was a report damaging to the proper management of that office.

Subsequently another resolution was adopted by this House directing further investigation into the conduct of the collector of the port of New York. And now that committee have brought forward a resolution asking the House to vote that that officer ought to be removed. And now my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] makes a motion to substitute for that a resolution that this officer should be impeached.

It seems to me it will strike the mind of my friend, and of every other gentleman here, that it is not right that we should come to the conclusion that any officer of this Government should be impeached without an investigation by a committee directed by the House to look directly to the propriety of impeachment. And I undertake to say—I say it from general recollection, and not from any accurate investigation I have given to the subject—that no precedent will be found in the history of this Government where such a resolution as that suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has been adopted without its being preceded by an investigation by a committee charged with the business of ascertaining whether there is sufficient ground for finding articles of impeachment. I submit that such has been the invariable practice, and that it is manifestly just.

Now, look at what has occurred in this case. No investigation has been set on foot looking to the propriety of presenting articles of impeachment, and no committee has hinted that impeachment ought to take place, unless the hint can be found in the resolution reported by my friend from New York, [Mr. HULBURD,] declaring that Mr. Smythe ought to be removed. But every gentleman will see instantly that no impeachment is involved in the resolution of the committee. All that the resolution declares is that Mr. Smythe ought to be removed. It does not say that he ought to be removed for high crimes and misdemeanors. We have no committee that has recommended or suggested that an impeachment ought to occur. Copying from the precedents, I have drawn up a resolution, which I hope will be accepted by my friend from Pennsylvania as a substitute for his proposition—a resolution corresponding in form to that which has in our legislative history invariably preceded the presentation of articles of impeachment. By this customary form of resolution the committee having charge of the subject—usually the Judiciary Committee, (once, in the case of Judge Chase, a select committee headed by Mr. Randolph, of Virginia)—is charged with the business of inquiring whether the constitutional powers of the House with reference to impeachment should be interposed in the case.

Mr. WOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question, if he will permit me?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Certainly.

Mr. WOOD. I would like the gentleman to state whether in the history of the Government there is any precedent for an attempt to impeach an officer whom the President has the power to remove? Judge Chase, to whose case the gentleman has referred, was a judge of the Supreme Court, and could not be removed by the President.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Ohio will permit me to suggest to the gentleman from New York that the President, under the tenure-of-office act, has not the power to remove Mr. Smythe.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Fortunately for the reputation and good character of our Government, the examples of impeachment in our history are extremely few. I know of no case in which an impeachment was instituted against an officer whom the President had the power to remove; but I say that in this case, under the present state of the law, since the passage of the tenure-of-office act, there is no power of removal by the President without the assent of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. With the leave of the gentleman from Ohio, I will call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the words of the Constitution—

"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, there can be no question of the power of Congress to impeach any official; but I deny that it was designed that this mode of removal should be resorted to in cases where the Executive has the power to act, as he has in this case. And, Mr. Speaker, as evidence of the fact—

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to say that the Executive has not the power of removal in this case, except with the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. WOOD. There is some doubt about that. There is some doubt about the constitutionality of the law by which the gentleman claims the President is deprived of the power of removal.

Mr. GARFIELD. The law is operative until decided to be unconstitutional:

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, after nearly a century's experience under the Constitution of 1787, this is the first proposition to impeach an officer whom the Executive has the power to remove without a resort to this mode of getting rid of him.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, there can be no serious doubt of the constitutional right of this House to present articles of impeachment against any civil officer of the Government of the United States. I believe that, upon second thought, my friend from New York himself would not doubt it. It has never been questioned, and I think there can be no serious doubt about it.

Mr. CHANLER. The gentleman's argument is taking a very wide range. If the gentleman has an amendment to offer, and it will be accepted, I have no objection; but the question now before the House is of a character which does not call for this debate on the Constitution.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I have only one word more to say. I only wish to suggest that all the precedents in regard to setting on foot proceedings for impeachment are like the one to which I refer, and which I take from the case of Judge Chase. I will read the resolution in that case:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the official conduct of Samuel Chase, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of Richard Peters, district judge of the district of Pennsylvania, and to report their opinion, whether the said Samuel Chase and Richard Peters, or either of them, have so acted in their judicial capacity as to require the interposition of the constitutional power of this House."

On that resolution articles of impeachment were set on foot. On the 6th of March, Mr. Randolph made a report in favor of an impeachment, and thereupon the articles were preferred.

I will conclude by saying there is a manifest impropriety in the House jumping to the conclusion indicated by the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

The amendment I have prepared is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures of this House be directed to inquire into the official conduct of Henry A. Smythe, collector of the port of New York, and to report their opinion, whether the said Smythe has so acted in his said official capacity as to require the interposition of the constitutional power of this House.

Mr. CHANLER. I yield now to my colleague [Mr. PRUYN] for a few moments.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker, I believe there are now two amendments pending before the House to the original resolution, one the amendment proposed which contemplates impeachment, and the other a reference of the matter to the committee for further investigation. Any further amendment at this time would be out of order. I had intended to offer an amendment while listening to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] referring this testimony to the President of the United States for such action, such immediate action, if you please, action without delay, as in his judgment should be necessary to protect the public business. It matters but little, perhaps, whether the testimony now before the House, or rather the testimony in possession of the committee—for it has not yet been given to the members of the House—should come to members for action at this time, or whether the investigation should be further prosecuted with a view to elicit the facts which surround this matter.

Now, sir, in regard to Mr. Smythe I have no communication from him. I have no explanation from any of his friends in regard to the charges made against him by my colleague who addressed the House a few days ago. I do not purpose to go into any defense of Mr. Smythe's conduct in the particulars to which the committee has referred, even if such defense can be made, and I believe in time proper explanations will be made.

I do not propose to go into explanation further than to refer to what the chairman of the committee said when he addressed the House in regard to the matter. I cordially agree with my colleague from New York [Mr. WOOD] in the statement he made a few days ago in regard to the character and position of Mr. Smythe at the time this important appointment was conferred upon him. My personal acquaintance with Mr. Smythe is very slight. I doubt whether I have seen him for ten minutes together for the last five years. But I know that in years past, whenever the merchants and business men of New York have been called upon to name representative men from their number, Mr. Smythe has been uniformly selected for that purpose, perhaps has been selected oftener than any other in that city. So great was the confidence in his business character and integrity that the bank over which he presided, of which he was president when appointed collector of the port, that it received in a short time, I think within twelve months, an amount of deposits in its vaults unprecedented except in the case of the old United States Bank.

These deposits, I believe, were over twenty million dollars in one bank, the capital of which was only $3,000,000. These facts go to show the great confidence which was reposed in Mr. Smythe.

Now, sir, it is proposed here, without having had an opportunity to read this testimony, without that full investigation which this case really demands, to declare to the world, as the deliberate judgment of this House, that Mr. Smythe is a man totally unfit to hold the position which he occupies, and that he ought to be removed. Now, sir, I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] in saying that until we know what the facts are, until our judgments are convinced, from a perusal of the testimony, that this man ought to be impeached or removed, it is an unwise and ill-judged proceeding, not to say a harsh proceeding, on the part of this House to pronounce a judgment. It would, under the circumstances, be a judgment in advance.

I heartily agree with my colleague [Mr. CHANLER] in his comments on the general character, management, and influence of the New York custom-house. Many excellent men, many men of high character, whom I know well, have been at the head of that custom-house at different times, but on the whole its management for years past has been a curse to any political party that controlled it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to modify my amendment?

Mr. CHANLER. I will give the gentleman an opportunity when my colleague gets through.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I did not know but he would like to hear it before proceeding further.

Mr. CHANLER. Undoubtedly, but probably he had better not. [Laughter.] Another gentleman will follow him immediately. I wish to gratify my friend from Missouri, [Mr. NOELL.]

Mr. PRUYN. Now, sir, that custom-house ought to be reformed, thoroughly reformed. The clerkships should be given out after competitive examination; they should not be given to politicians as such. The fees should be reduced to the minimum which will enable the Government to carry out its system of public stores and pay the incidental expenses of the management of the custom-house. The New York merchants should not be compelled to pay tribute to any public officers or to any political party. It is time the whole thing ended, for it is a disgrace to the country and carries its baleful influence throughout the whole length and breadth of the land.

There are some things in regard to this matter which I would like to lay before the House, but it seems my time is rapidly drawing to a close and I must shortly yield. I wish, however, to be distinctly understood in regard to this matter, that I want the conduct of Mr. Smythe to be most thoroughly investigated, and if he has been guilty of the acts attributed to him he ought to be removed at once. I for one will join with any number of gentlemen on this floor in passing any resolution which is requisite for the purpose of bringing this case before the proper authority and for removing this man if proved guilty of the offenses charged. But let us first know what the facts are, and give him the opportunity which we give to the meanest criminal of defending himself.

Mr. CHANLER. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I modify my amendment as follows:

That the testimony taken by the Committee on Public Expenditures relating to the conduct of Henry A. Smythe, collector of the port of New York, be referred to the said committee, with a view to ascertain whether or not said Smythe has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors sufficient to justify his impeachment; and if said committee find from that and other evidence that he has been thus guilty, then to proceed and prepare articles of impeachment and report the same to this House, and that they have leave to send for persons and papers.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. This modification being made, I withdraw my proposed amendment.

Mr. CHANLER. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri five minutes.

Mr. HULBURD. Will the gentleman allow me just one minute?

Mr. NOELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HULBURD. I rise simply to say that so far as I am individually concerned I am willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as a substitute for the original proposition reported by the committee. I have no right to accept it on behalf of the committee, but individually believing that the temper of the House is for something more severe than the proposition which the committee reported I assent to the substitute, and shall vote for it.

Mr. CHANLER. I hope, sir, it will be found more politic and more fair.

Mr. NOELL. The resolution which has just been read, taken in connection with the character of the proceedings had before this time, presents a very anomalous spectacle to this House. Testimony was taken before a committee of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and that committee was discharged. That testimony was by a resolution of this House referred to a committee of this Congress. It has not been read by a majority of the members of the Committee on Public Expenditures; and if it has been read by any of the members of this House outside of that committee, it has been read by but very few of them. Yet it is upon this testimony that we are now called upon to pass a resolution asking for the dismissal of a high officer of the Government. This body is to assume all powers, waiving its own special rights, ignoring the rights of the Executive, and having no regard for the course which, out of due regard for ourselves, we are bound under the Constitution to pursue. We are to undertake a new process. The majority of this House are asked to institute a new proceeding by which we are to constitute ourselves the executive authority of the United States.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NOELL. Certainly.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I move to amend the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] by adding to it the words "and to sit during the recess of Congress."

Mr. NOELL. I was very glad to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER]—who is rapidly assuming the leadership of the great party now controlling the destiny of this country—I was very glad to hear him put himself in such a fair position, to hear him avow such honesty of purpose in the proceeding which he desired to have instituted in this House. I was very glad to hear him quote those maxims of justice, and not only maxims of justice but also Latin phrases, such as might be indelibly impressed upon the memory of those who heard him.

What he said was followed by the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] that we should at least restrict our action to such course as was in our power; that we should have recourse to the only method by which we had power to act, the finding of articles of impeachment. And thus we have at last come to where we should have started out. If this officer has been guilty of half the crimes charged against him, then as a friend of the Administration which appointed him I for one demand that his conduct shall be fully and fairly investigated, and that the full meed of punishment shall be allotted to him.

But we see resolutions presented to this House asking members who have never read a particle of the evidence in this case to take upon themselves to demand the dismissal of this officer, and perhaps to thus take a step toward another impeachment, this being in itself but an insignificant affair. We are called upon, upon the simple recommendation of a committee, to ask the President to remove this officer. If he fails to do it, then I suppose this garbled testimony is to be taken and used as a means to that other impeachment to which members are looking. Sir, it is getting to be dangerous times when the characters and reputation of men as high as the character of the gentleman whose conduct we are now investigating was said to be before his appointment; when the characters of such men are to be swept away by a simple resolution, without investigation of any kind; when the House of Representatives is to set itself to work to destroy men's reputation, and to indicate to other departments of the Government what shall be their course.

We have heard the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] declare that this body was the highest judicial tribunal in this country, and that the decisions of the courts were no longer to stand against the voice of a popular faction. We have had it boldly announced here that however much that faction may be disposed to trample upon the rights of others, this Congress is absolute and sovereign. And now we have a new doctrine announced equally as specious as that; and that is that the House of Representatives shall henceforth be constituted the executive department of the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CHANLER. I would inquire of the Chair how much of my hour is left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes of his hour remaining. The morning hour will expire in four minutes.

Mr. CHANLER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NOELL] for the remainder of the morning hour. Then this matter will go over until to-morrow, and in the mean time

I hope members will examine this subject and be prepared to do justice.

Mr. NOELL. Mr. Speaker, it has been paraded before this House that the majority of the committee, constituting all the members except two, have reported this resolution; and it is urged that the House should have full faith in their committee, and should give full credit to their proceedings. Let me say, sir, that we have taken but very little testimony; and I for one have been unable to examine any considerable portion of that testimony. I believe that in this respect other members of the committee are in the same condition as myself, with the exception of perhaps two.

Now, there seems on this occasion to be a division of sentiment upon the part of those who have always acted harmoniously heretofore; and the two great leaders of the Radical party have led off in favor of a more severe as well as more just method of procedure than that proposed by the committee. It is a happy state of affairs, sir, when men have reached the extreme verge so that they can go no further, and when a sense of justice creates within their bosoms feelings of a reactionary character. It is to be hoped that this strong sense of justice will influence to a greater extent gentlemen who are controlling the Legislature of the country, and that we shall have in the future more appeals to the rights of individuals, the powers of the Constitution, and those maxims of justice which have hitherto controlled every civilized community.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose of further considering the resolution of the Committee on Public Expenditures in reference to Collector Smythe. It will take but a few minutes to dispose of the question.

On the motion of Mr. BROOMALL, there were—ayes 61, noes 47.

Mr. BROOMALL. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BROOMALL and Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 40.

So (two thirds not having voted in favor thereof) the motion to suspend the rules was not agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the Committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 61) to provide for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, and for other purposes, when the Speaker signed the same.

STEAMSHIP PAONSHUN.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the Senate:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 22, 1867.

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be requested to return to the Senate Senate bill No. 60, entitled "An act to change the name of the steamship Paonshun."

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this bill will be returned to the Senate as requested.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—AGAIN.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table, the motion was agreed to.

BOUNTIES OF MISSOURI TROOPS.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 6) placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with others as to bounties.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line five strike out the words "borne on the rolls as slaves."

Mr. McCLURG. I move the House concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. McCLURG moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX ON WRAPPING-PAPER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 72) to exempt wrapping-paper made from wood or corn-stalks from internal tax.

The amendment was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following as a new section:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That every national banking association, State bank, banker, or association shall pay a tax of ten per cent. on the amount of the notes of any town, city, or municipal corporation paid out by them after the 1st day of May, 1867, to be collected in the mode and manner in which the tax on the notes of State banks is collected.

Mr. BLAINE. I move that the House concur in the amendment; and I desire to explain its effect. The present law taxes the notes of State banks ten per cent. The cities throughout the South—New Orleans, Memphis, Savannah, and other cities—have issued in very large quantities a sort of municipal scrip or "shinplaster" currency, and the notes of this character are paid out by the banks as circulation. The amendment of the Senate is designed to check this species of circulation. I call for the previous question on concurring in the amendment.

Mr. PRUYN. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. These are issued under State authority, and what right have we to interfere with them?

Mr. BLAINE. We have the right to tax them. We put them upon the same basis of taxation as that already provided for the notes of State banks. This is merely a tax upon the scrip of these States when used as circulating medium the same as upon the notes of State banks.

Mr. BROOKS. What has this to do with straw paper?

Mr. JUDD. I hope my friend from Maine will allow me to suggest a small amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. Is it about ladders?

Mr. JUDD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. I cannot consent to have this proposition burdened with this amendment, which the Senate have already rejected. The Senate have put upon it an amendment which is not germane, but for which they are answerable.

Mr. CHANLER. The gentleman from Maine has no right to decide whether the amendment of the Senate is germane or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has often been called upon to rule on these amendments. If this amendment had been offered in the House it would not have been germane. The Senate have exercised the right to offer amendments which it has under the Constitution.

Mr. BLAINE. Being upon the bill by order of the Senate, which we cannot question, and being highly proper in itself as an independent measure deserving the support of the House, I hope there will be no hesitation in agreeing to put it upon this bill. I demand the previous question.

Mr. JUDD. I ask the Chair for information. If the demand for the previous question be seconded will I not then be cut off from moving my amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will not be in order to move an amendment if the previous question be seconded.

Mr. JUDD. I hope, then, the demand for the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. BLAINE. If we put in "ladders" again it will kill the whole thing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state if the previous question be not seconded and the amendment for "ladders" is offered he will consider it in order, as the Senate have amended the title so as to make it read "and for other purposes." The Chair will regard "ladders" as coming in under "other purposes."

Mr. EGGLESTON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me. I ask leave to amend by providing that "stoves" shall also be embraced in the free list.

Mr. BLAINE. I cannot consent to yield for any such amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope the "ladder" amendment will be introduced.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 48.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BLAINE and Mr. JUDD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-one, noes not counted.

Mr. BLAINE. I give it up.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. JUDD. I move to insert after the word "paper" the word "ladders."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the gentleman's amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act, ladders made of wood shall be exempted from internal tax.

Mr. JUDD. I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I move to insert "stoves."

Mr. BLAINE. Stoves made of wood? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not understand my opposition to his introducing his amendment as personal to himself. If one article may be put upon the free list others may also without any investigation by the Committee of Ways and Means, thus cutting we do not know how far into the revenues of the Government. If ladders may be put in in this way I do not see any reason why others may not also be put in the free list. I do not see any reasons why "ladders" should be put upon the free list except that an intelligent, estimable gentleman would like to have it done for his constituents. If I were going to vote for any gentleman I would vote for the gentleman from Illinois as soon as for any other; but as it is not the purpose, or not the policy of the House, as it seems to me, to vote on the request of any gentleman for any measure, I think we should not act on these questions until we have had the regular committees appointed and their reports for our information.

The other day the gentleman said we had put brush-blocks, wooden handles, machinery made of wood, and a number of other articles on the free list, and I called his attention to the fact that they were put on mainly because they were parts of machines or implements, and brush-blocks should not be taxed because the brushes when finished were taxed. They were taken out simply not to duplicate the tax. The handles of machinery made of wood were not taxed, because the whole machines, handles and all, were taxed when completed and offered for sale. Now, to exempt ladders, a finished article, of which there are several manufacturers in the gentleman's district, is simply to relieve some three or four manufacturing establishments from paying any tax on what they produce. I ask this House whether it is willing now to single out articles in this way for the sake of exempting a few manufacturing firms. It is an absurd mode of legislating.

And if I may refer to the Senate, it seems to me that they very properly rejected the proposition after full debate and after the unanimous report of one of their standing committees against it. I hope, therefore, that this House will not add this amendment.

Mr. JUDD. I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, as he seems to think I am pressing the matter unduly in this House, that when this question was called to my attention by one of my constituents I notified him by letter that there would be no such general legislation, in my opinion, as would call for action upon this question. I found, however, a few days afterward, that members of long experience in legislation were introducing specific exemptions of precisely the same character, and I thought then that it was my duty to move this proposition. I saw gentlemen presenting questions similar to this, and I thought if I remained in my seat and did not press this proposition I would be derelict to my duty. I did not at first intend to call the attention of the House to this case until the Committee of Ways and Means had been appointed, but when I found subjects of this kind being acted upon I thought that mine was right and just, and that there was no reason why it should be rejected while others were successfully pressing like claims. That is the reason for my action. Now, if the gentleman will give me one single reason—

Mr. BLAINE. That is just what I want to do if he will allow me the floor as I allowed him when I had the floor.

Mr. JUDD. I will do it.

Mr. BLAINE. When I introduced my measure I submitted a letter from the late chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means stating that the omission was a mistake in the committee of conference; that they had included in the free list the only article which came in direct competition with that omitted, and that it would be very unfair to leave one article exempted and the other subject to tax. I moreover stated to the House that the only ground on which I could or would demand its consideration was to remedy a mistake which was vouched for by the late chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, whose accuracy would not be disputed by any gentleman of the House who knew him. It was upon that statement that the House voted to include the article, simply to remedy a defect in the legislation of the last session. My proposition was not as this is, to introduce new and original matter.

When the resolution reached the Senate there were various efforts made to attach other articles, just as was done by the gentleman from Illinois here, but the Senate committee rejected the whole of them and confined its legislation to that which this House had instituted in correction of a mistake. I wish to say further, that if the House agrees to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois the effect of it will be simply to kill the measure. As an independent proposition the House voted for the gentleman's measure. It did precisely the same for him that it did for me. I did not ask to embarrass his measure with any proposition of mine, and I ask him now not to embarrass or kill this by his amendment.

Mr. JUDD. The appeal of my friend is very strong, but I do not see the logic of it. He tells me that his was a case of mistake in the internal revenue law passed at the last session. I could understand it if he had said that it was a case of forgetfulness and not an omission. They did not think of the article when they left it out. It is precisely analogous to the case I now present to the House.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman stated in his seat—

Mr. JUDD. I assure the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] that I do not believe he will lose his bill. I do not believe that they in the other end of the Capitol will refuse to do that which is just in itself. We are at least bound to presume as members of this body that the other branch of the national Legislature will act in accordance with the principles of right and justice. If this House will put in my ladders, that will be evidence that it is right and just they should be put in; and we are bound to presume that the Senate will concur in that action.

Mr. BLAINE. But the Senate has already rejected the bill of the gentleman.

Mr. MYERS. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has said that he will not object to any amendments to cure defects in the legislation of the last Congress.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman will pardon me; I did not say I would favor amendments to this bill for such purposes. I said I would vote for other bills for those purposes.

Mr. MYERS. Well, I will go on and say what I have to say. In the last Congress this House voted to exempt from taxation fabrics the product of hand-looms. Some one moved to add the words "not made in penitentiaries;" and in that form the bill passed the House. The bill went to the Senate, where some one moved a technical amendment, not affecting the general proposition; but both Houses agreed to the exemption, which ought to have been incorporated into the law. Yet the committee of conference which was appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, exercising a judgment which perhaps technical parliamentary rules gave them the right to do, undertook to set aside the action of the two Houses because of these variations in the wording of the clause, and thus these fabrics came out from the action of that committee of conference taxable, as they were before. Now, I believe if ever there was a mistake or an error on the part of a committee of conference, it was that departure from the concurrent action of the two Houses.

Mr. KELLEY. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment that I may state to the House the language which was actually used by the two Houses of the last Congress?

Mr. MYERS. In a moment. I now move to amend by adding the words "and fabrics the product of hand-looms," I am sure my generous friend from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] will accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER. No further amendment is now in order, there being pending an amendment and an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MYERS. Then I will hereafter ask leave to offer it. I now yield to my colleague, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to state to the House what was the exact language used in the House, and how it was modified in the Senate. The clause adopted by the House was, "Fabrics the product of hand-looms, when not used in penitentiaries;" referring to the implements. The Senate amended the clause by striking out the word "used" and inserting the word "produced;" so that it read, "Fabrics the product of hand-looms, when not produced in penitentiaries." The one House had reference to the implement, the other to the production. But both Houses assented to the proposition that those fabrics should be released from taxation.

Mr. MYERS. I understand that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUDD] is willing to accept my amendment.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to move an amendment.

The SPEAKER. There are already pending an amendment and an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BANKS. Then I desire to make a remark or two. I would not press the exemption of any one of these articles if the tax upon them is necessary for the public interest. But if exemption is made in one case, it should upon the same ground be made in the other. At the last session of Congress wrapping-paper made from straw was exempted from taxation. It is now proposed that wrapping-paper made from wood and from corn-stalks shall also be exempt from taxation, leaving that most important branch of manufacture, paper made from Manila, subject to the tax. Now, when I can get the opportunity I shall move to insert the words "or Manila" after the word "corn-stalks."

There is no reason whatever why the manufacturer of wrapping paper from Manila should not be exempted from tax as well as the manufacturer of wrapping-paper from wood or cornstalks. I therefore desire to amend by inserting after "corn-stalks" the words "or Manila."

Mr. BLAINE. I have no objection to that amendment. I think it is very proper.

The SPEAKER. The amendment can be adopted by unanimous consent.

There was no objection; and the amendment was adopted.

Mr. JUDD. That does not help ladders at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUDD] to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. JUDD. I will do so.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to suggest that most of the paper of the kind intended to be included in this bill is manufactured, not from corn-stalks, but from stalks of sorghum. If there is any propriety in inserting Manila, we ought also to insert "stalks of sorghum."

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that in my view the provision of the internal revenue act should have exempted wrapping-paper of all kinds; and it seems to me it would be desirable to so amend it, if that result can in the present posture of the question be accomplished in any parliamentary form.

The SPEAKER. The amendment which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] suggests could not be made, because the portion of the bill to which it relates has been agreed to by both Houses.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not offer an amendment. I only made the suggestion.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will understand that unanimous consent is given to an amendment exempting wrapping-paper made from stalks of sorghum.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then the bill has another stalk to stand upon; and it may thereby be made a little stronger. [Laughter.]

But, sir, I wish to make another suggestion. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. JUDD,] and the other propositions which gentlemen seek to introduce here, are founded upon the neglect or mistake of Congress in failing to extend its legislation to certain objects which should have been provided for in our revenue laws. I think Congress has made a great many mistakes on this subject; and permit me to say that one very important mistake was in failing to adopt, when the tariff bill was under consideration, certain amendments offered by me, which, if that bill had become (as it ought to have become) a law, would have given much needed protection to those industrial interests involved in the manufacture of fibers of hemp and flax. I have within twenty-four hours received positive information that a large factory, in which one gentleman has invested his whole means, amounting to $30,000, is with various others in the western country, including some located in my district, compelled to stop because of the want of proper protective legislation.

If we are to revise the mistakes and omissions of our tax laws and tariff, I hope we shall not merely make a patch here and a patch there, but that the door will be thrown wide open, so as to afford an opportunity to remedy the various deficiencies of our legislation in this respect. I have no objection to ladders, not even the ladder of fame by means of which the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. JUDD] is to climb into the good graces of his constituents by his admirable manner of managing this question. But, sir, while we are taking care of this interest of ladders and other special interests which are singled out and brought to our attention, I contend that there is a propriety in opening this whole question of our internal revenue and tariff laws, so that their deficiencies and irregularities may be removed. Unless there is to be a fair and open fight, so that all the different interests requiring legislation may receive proper attention, I think we had better close the door against these isolated propositions. Then the gentlemen interested in ladders and other matters now urged upon our consideration will help us hereafter in getting a general correction of the various mistakes and deficiencies of our legislation. But I am afraid that if gentlemen get their own axes ground separately we shall not have a general turning of the grindstone hereafter for the benefit of all our tools that may need sharpening. [Laughter.]

Mr. JUDD. I do not believe in the closing remark of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not mean it in any offensive sense. I did not mean that he had any ax to grind.

Mr. JUDD. I am aware of that. If the honorable gentleman from Ohio offered any proposition which commended itself to my judgment as fair and right, then I would vote for it, even though it might not be an "omnibus bill," even though it might not open the whole legislation upon the tariff bill. If, on the whole evidence, his proposition were right, I would vote for it, even though all the other like questions could not be brought before the House at the same time.

If I understand the question, the honorable gentleman from Maine has accepted the amendment to insert "Manila."

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to have it so amended that the provision shall be general, that all wrapping-papers shall be exempted from internal taxation.

Mr. JUDD. The honorable gentleman will allow me one word further. He fears the bill will be lost altogether if it must go back to the Senate; but that objection is obviated by the amendments already made. There can be no reason, therefore, based upon that why "ladders" should not come in.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman has already had a trial of the ladder question in the Senate and has been defeated. The Senate have fully considered this paper question and have agreed to it. He now wants to put these "ladders" upon the paper platform to see whether he cannot have it carried through in that way.

Mr. JUDD. We are all allowed to have a sober second thought, and I hope the honorable gentleman from Maine will not exclude the other branch of Congress from having that sober second thought. My conviction is, when they come again to consider the provision for ladders, they will adopt it. I believe they will give it a safe deliverance.

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to a question of order. I should like to know the condition of this question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. JUDD. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know what amount of revenue is derived from "ladders," but as the gentleman states there are only two or three manufactories of this article, I presume the amount of revenue is small. But when it is proposed to exempt "stoves" it seems to me that there are many other articles which we will have to exempt from taxation for a like reason. If I remember correctly, the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue states that last year we raised a revenue of $300,000 from "stoves;" and from a conversation I had with the Commissioner I learned that this does not include all; that the revenue derived from castings and hollow-ware would make it amount to $1,000,000.

I am aware that a portion of these articles are exempted; but I am not prepared, Mr. Speaker, without further action, to exempt stoves from taxation unless we shall go into a general revision of the internal tax bill. If we do anything at all we should consider the whole list. I say it is not fair in this way to be bringing forward article after article to be put upon the free list without the ordinary investigation which all such matters ought to have, I hope "stoves" will not be included, and that "ladders" even will not be included.

Mr. MYERS. I rise to a question of order. Is it not in order for the gentleman from Ohio to accept my amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can offer his amendment before the vote is taken.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I accept the amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to make any extended remarks on this subject. I am surprised that one of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means should make an argument against my amendment, as if it were a new question. He says that we collect a revenue of $300,000 from stoves and hollow-ware. Hollow-ware was exempted by the Thirty-Ninth Congress from all taxation. How much revenue is collected on what is left?

Now, sir, the article of stoves is almost universally used throughout the western country. There is not a cabin in Illinois, Iowa, or Ohio in which you will not find a stove; and I do not see why it should not be exempted as well as articles manufactured in any other section of the country which enter into general use. The tax comes off the consumer. Hollow-ware has been exempted, and yet it paid more tax than stoves.

In addition to that this House exempted stoves by an almost unanimous vote. They were put on the free list by the House; but when the bill went to the Senate they were stricken out through mistake, as one of the members of that body informed me. Therefore I say we should put these back on the free list.

Mr. JUDD. I now call the previous question.

Mr. COVODE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUDD. I decline to yield further.

Mr. COVODE. I wanted to save the ladders.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 64, noes 20; and the main question ordered.

The question first recurred on the amendment to the amendment, to add after the word "tax" the word "stoves, and fabrics, the product of hand-looms;" and being put, there were—ayes 42, noes 60.

Mr. EGGLESTON demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment to add the word "ladders;" and being put, there were—ayes 50, noes 47.

Mr. UPSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the amendment of the Senate as amended.

Mr. JUDD. If the House refuse to concur in the amendment of the Senate as amended, then the Senate amendment is defeated.

Mr. BLAINE. And the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois also.

Mr. SPALDING. What becomes of the ladders, then? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for tellers on the amendment of the Senate.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. GARFIELD and JUDD.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 49.

Mr. JUDD. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. I rise to a question of order. If the amendment of the Senate is voted down does it not leave the bill simply with paper included in it?

The SPEAKER. The House simply disagrees to the Senate amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If it is voted down it will leave the circulation which the gentleman from Maine wants taxed untaxed, will it not? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It would.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 56, not voting 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Benjamin, Benton, Broomall, Buckland, Churchill, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Elia, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Gravelly, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kitchen, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Marshall, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercur, Moore, Morrell, Munger, Myers, O'Neill, Plants, Polsey, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Thaddous Stevens, Stewart, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Twitchell, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, John T. Wilson, and Windom—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Archer, Baldwin, Beaman, Blair, Boutwell, Brooks, Cake, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Eldridge, Fields, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Hulburd, Humphrey, Kerr, Ketcham, Mallory, Marvin, Miller, Morrissey, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Paine, Penham, Peters, Poland, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Schenck, Smith, Spaulding, Taber, Trowbridge, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—56.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnes, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Brownell, Burr, Butler, Dawes, Denison, Dodge, Driggs, Eliot, Griswold, Harding, Hill, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kelsey, Laflin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, McNulloch, Moorhead, Morgan, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Robinson, Selye, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Stone, Upson, William B. Washburn, Thomas Williams, and James F. Wilson—40.

So the amendment of the Senate, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. JUDD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, the papers in the case of Mrs. Mary Ripley were withdrawn from the files of the House.

COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

The SPEAKER. As the House will be in session probably but a few days, and it is necessary to have some resolutions submitted to the Committee on Printing in regard to the printing of some extra copies of books and documents, the Chair will now appoint the following gentlemen as members of the joint Committee on Printing: ADDISON H. LAFLIN of New York, JACOB H. ELA of New Hampshire, and HENRY L. CAKE of Pennsylvania.

MAIL CONTRACT IN OREGON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 29, to terminate a contract of a member of Congress with the Post Office Department of the United States of America; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read at length. The preamble recites that by an act of Congress, approved April 21, 1808, it is provided that no member of Congress shall, directly or indirectly, himself or by any other person in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, execute, hold, or enjoy, in whole or in part, any contract or agreement thereafter to be made or entered into with any officer of the United States, or to any benefit and rights therefrom, &c.; and that the present contractor for route No. 14782, from Lincoln, California, to Portland, Oregon, has recently been elected a United States Senator.

The joint resolution provides that the Postmaster General shall be authorized to cancel the contract between the United States and the present contractor for the transportation of the mail on route No. 14782, between Lincoln, California, and Portland, Oregon, annulling the same in the usual way, to take effect on the 30th day of September, 1867; it also makes it the duty of the Postmaster General, after the passage of this joint resolution, to advertise for bids for the performance of the service for the residue of the contract term, for at least sixty days in at least one newspaper published at the seat of government of the State of California, and one newspaper published in Portland, Oregon, and to contract with the lowest responsible bidder.

Mr. FERRY. I move to amend the joint resolution by adding the following:

Provided, That the Postmaster General, in accordance with the usage of the Department, shall have power to reject any bid which he may deem exorbitant.

I desire briefly to call the attention of the House to the effect of this joint resolution of the Senate. It provides for the cancellation of a contract made with a person who, since the execution of the contract, has been elected to the Senate of the United States. As will be observed by the House, this joint resolution is mandatory in its character; the usual discretion accorded to the Postmaster General has been omitted, and he is compelled to accept the offer of the lower bidder.

This matter of service upon this mail route came incidentally before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, upon an application for ocean mail service between San Francisco, California, and Portland, Oregon. By a joint resolution passed in February last, a contract was let to parties to the amount of $25,000. Now, I am advised by the Post Office Department that this contract can be let now at a less sum than is now embodied in the contract with the Senator-elect. There are no objections on the part of the Department to the cancellation of that contract. But if this resolution is adopted in its present form, there is nothing to prevent parties forming a ring, making such bids as they may agree upon between themselves, and the Department will be compelled to award the contract to the lowest bidder, no matter how much the Government may be defrauded thereby. Now, instead of limiting the Postmaster General to a specified sum, which would be practically fixing the amount of the new contract, I have offered this amendment, granting the usual discretion to the Postmaster General. I trust the House will adopt the amendment. I call the previous question on the joint resolution and pending amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GRADING CAPITOL GROUNDS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 64, to provide in part for grading the public grounds, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations when the same shall have been appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD, (at two o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

LAWS OF NEW MEXICO.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) to make valid the laws of New Mexico passed at the session of the Legislature held at Santa Fé from the 3d day of December, 1866, to the 31st day of January, 1867; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I hope that this resolution will be put on its passage now.

The joint resolution, which was read at length, provides that the laws passed by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico at its last session, which began on the 3d day of December, 1866, and ended on the 31st day of January, 1867, and signed by W. F. M. Army, secretary and acting Governor of said Territory of New Mexico, shall have the same force and effect as though the same had been approved and signed by the Governor duly appointed, subject to the future revision and approval of Congress.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMS, ETC., FOR TENNESSEE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) directing the Secretary of War to furnish certain arms and equipments to the State of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, during the last session of Congress I frequently had interviews on the subject embraced in this resolution with the gentlemen representing in the Thirty-Ninth Congress the State of Tennessee, and at the request of one of the Senators from that State, who is a member of the Fortieth Congress, I have concluded to urge upon the House the passage of this joint resolution at the present time.

The necessities of the State of Tennessee demand the passage of this joint resolution at our hands. The provisions of the new reconstruction act do not extend to that State; but the loyal people of the State are obliged to defend themselves as best they can against the rebels who now reside among them. They are compelled to do this at a great disadvantage, because, as is well known, the Union soldiers who left the Federal Army were not permitted to take with them their arms unless they purchased them, while the rebel soldiers from that State, when they left the rebel army and returned to Tennessee, carried back with them their arms. And the black troops, when they have purchased their arms from the Government, have been for the most part robbed of them by the rebels of Tennessee. Now, sir, unless some measure of this kind be passed the loyal men of that State will have no means in their hands of making good the provisions of their recent legislation.

The adoption of this measure can involve no loss to our Government, because, as will be seen by a reference to the report of the Secretary of War, the Government has on hand at this time a million and a half of improved arms, to say nothing of the large number of arms which are not of the improved pattern. I venture to say that we have on hand to-day two million five hundred thousand small-arms, which, if we ever engage in another war, we shall spurn as we spurned the old thirty-nine caliber smooth-bore when the last war commenced. We shall resort to breech-loaders as the other great nations of the world are doing, and these arms will be useless to the Government. Unless they be used in this or some other similar way now, they will never be used at all. The Government can lose nothing by bestowing these arms upon the State of Tennessee.

But, sir, the number of arms called for in the resolution is entirely inadequate. The gentlemen who have represented that State have called for, and justly called for, ten thousand. The Senator from that State desires that this number should be granted. It is proper that this number should be embraced in the resolution.

It should have been embraced in the joint resolution, and I desire to amend by striking out "twenty-five hundred" and inserting "ten thousand" in lieu of it. I now demand the previous question.

The joint resolution, which was read, directs the Secretary of War to furnish arms and equipments to the State of Tennessee sufficient for twenty-five hundred militia, to be accounted for by the said State to the Government of the United States.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. PAINE. I withdraw the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire simply to say, in the absence of any Military Committee, I have been requested, as chairman of the committee in a former Congress, to turn my attention to this matter. I find these arms can be furnished, if needed, in a greater number without any detriment or loss, but probably in the nature of a saving to the Government in having the arms taken care of. I think ten thousand is quite as small a number as ought to be furnished to that State. Tennessee is in an anomalous condition. It was one of the rebel States; it is now one of the loyal States, but has not had the advantage of the distribution of arms as the other loyal States have. I hope for the reasons stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin that the joint resolution will be amended by increasing the number to ten thousand instead of twenty-five hundred as proposed by the Senate.

Mr. ROSS. I hope I will be permitted to make an amendment, that instead of accounting for them the State shall be compelled to pay for them.

Mr. SCHENCK. Illinois does not pay for her arms.

Mr. PAINE. I demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 80, noes 15.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be now put.

Mr. ROSS demanded the yeas and nays on Mr. PAINE's amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 28, not voting 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cornell, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eia, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravely, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Ketcham, Kitchin, Koontz, Laffin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercur, Moore, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Platts, Poland, Polsey, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barnes, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Humphrey, Kerr, Marshall, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Pruyn, Randall, Ross, Sitgreaves, Taber, Van Auker, Van Trump, and Wood—28.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bingham, Bromwell, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Covode, Dawes, Denison, Eliot, Farnsworth, Griswold, Harding, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Loughbridge, Lynch, McCullough, Miller, Moorhead, Morgan, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Robinson, Selye, Shellabarger, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Thomas, Van Wyck, and William B. Washburn—34.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROSS moved that the joint resolution be laid upon the table.

The motion was disagreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MISSOURI CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

Mr. McCLURG, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the time for taking testimony in the contested-election cases of Birch vs. Van Horn in the sixth congressional district of Missouri, and Switzler vs. Anderson in the ninth congressional district of Missouri, is hereby extended for sixty days from the expiration of the time prescribed by law in such cases respectively.

PRINTING OF BILLS.

Mr. LAFLIN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolutions; which were severally referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the bankrupt law be printed for the use of the House.

Resolved, That two thousand copies of the bill to provide for a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara be printed for the use of the House.

THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he is compelled to be absent from the city tomorrow, and as the House has not adjourned over, he asks leave of absence, the first day that he has asked, and also the privilege of designating some gentleman to act as Speaker pro tempore.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER then designated Mr. SCHENCK as Speaker pro tempore.

GOVERNMENT SUITS IN ENGLAND.

Mr. BANKS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the House of Representatives, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, copies of the correspondence, legal proceedings and other documents relating to the suit of the United States vs. Prioleau and others, pending in the court of chancery of England.

The resolution being a call for executive information, was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. BANKS. As this correspondence may not be copied in time to be returned at this session, I ask consent that the Secretary of State be authorized to make the communication in print.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

APPOINTMENT OF WATCHMEN.

Mr. VANAERNAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the appointment of certain watchmen, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROSS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 6) placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with others as to bounties; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PRUYN asked and obtained leave of absence for the residue of the session.

ORIGINALITY OF AN INVENTION.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent that a bill, with an accompanying report, be laid on the table and printed. It was before a committee in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and they were unable to report it for lack of time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know how a gentleman can make a report for the Thirty-Ninth Congress and have it printed.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent to have it done.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I object. Mr. MYERS. I believe the gentleman will withdraw his objection when I state what it is. The report and bill refer to the celebrated invention of the "induction coil," for which the Emperor of France and a French commission have awarded the originality to Rumkorf, a foreigner.

Mr. SPALDING. Then I object. [Laughter.]

Mr. MYERS. We declare Dr. Charles G. Page, of Washington, an American, entitled to that merit and honor.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

HENRY A. SMYTHE.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Public Expenditures.

Mr. SPALDING (at three o'clock and twenty minutes) moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 50, noes 64.

On the motion of Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, to suspend the rules there were—ayes 65, noes 41.

Mr. BROOMALL demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. HULBURT and CHANLER.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 33.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 95, nays 33, not voting 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eia, Ferriss, Fields, Garfield, Gravely, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercur, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Polsey, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twitchell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—95.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barnes, Beaman, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Hill, Holman, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Kerr, Kitchin, Marshall, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Pruyn, Ross, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Taber, Van Auker, Van Trump, and Wood—33.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Bingham, Bromwell, Reader W. Clarke, Dawes, Denison, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finney, Griswold, Harding, Hopkins, Ingersoll, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Loughbridge, Lynch, McCullough, Moorhead, Morgan, Phelps, Pike, Pike, Platts, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Randall, Raum, Robinson, Selye, Stone, and William B. Washburn—38.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on Public Expenditures, in relation to Henry A. Smythe, collector of the port of New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] is entitled to the floor for three minutes.

Mr. WOOD. Will my colleague yield to me for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. CHANLER. Certainly.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. CHANLER. Before that motion is put, I move that when House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion of Mr. CHANLER was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. WOOD, that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. Is it in order to move to postpone the further consideration of this subject for the present?

The SPEAKER. That motion would be in order.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until the second Wednesday in December next; and upon that motion I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes thirteen, noes not counted.

So the motion to postpone was not agreed to. Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I now call the previous question on the resolution and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The resolution reported from the Committee on Public Expenditures was as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that Henry A. Smythe should be immediately removed from the office of collector of the port of New York, and that the Clerk of the House cause a certified copy of this resolution to be laid before the President of the United States.

The first question was upon the amendment of Mr. HULBURD, to insert the words "the Senate and" before the words "the President of the United States."

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 36, noes 32; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, and Mr. NOELL were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes seventy, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The substitute proposed by Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, was to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the testimony taken by the Committee on Public Expenditures, relating to the conduct of Henry A. Smythe, collector of the port of New York, be referred to the said committee with the view of ascertaining whether or not said Smythe has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors sufficient to justify his impeachment; and if said committee find from that and other evidence that he has been thus guilty, then to proceed to prepare articles of impeachment and to report the same to this House, and that they have leave to send for persons and papers.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. WOODBRIDGE, to amend the substitute by adding the words "and to sit during the recess of Congress."

Mr. ROSS. I move to amend the amendment by adding the words "at their own expense." [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That amendment is not now in order, as the House is acting under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. COVODE. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment, that the committee be directed to report immediately.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I suppose the committee are now authorized to report at any time, and to sit during the recess of Congress, under a former resolution adopted by this House.

Mr. PETERS. I think the resolution which the House adopted the other day on motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHERCK] is the same in effect as the substitute now proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] I ask that the resolution be now read.

The SPEAKER. It will require unanimous consent to have that resolution read at this time.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I object; let us act upon this matter at once.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. WOODBRIDGE, and upon a division, there were—ayes 50, noes 36.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the substitute of Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, as amended; and upon a division there were—ayes 70, noes 28.

So the substitute was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARD. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada: The petition of J. F. Bennett, A. H. Hackney, J. de J. Baca, and other citizens of the county of Doña Ana, Territory of New Mexico, asking for the establishment of an assay office at the town of La Mesilla.

Also, a memorial for the establishment of a mail route between New Auburn, in Sibley county, via Transit and Eagle City and La Fayette, in Nicollet county, to New Ulm, in Brown county.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 23, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. ISAAC WESCOTT, D. D., of New York.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask that the Journal be corrected where it states that it was upon the motion of Mr. CORBETT that the Senate concurred in the amendment of the House to the joint resolution to terminate a contract of a member of Congress with the Post Office Department. It was not on the motion of the Senator from Oregon, but on the motion of a Senator on that side of the Chamber. I move that that correction be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will be so corrected.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOWE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of connecting the Mississippi river and Lake Michigan by navigable channels through the Wisconsin, Fox, and Rock rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARLAN presented the memorial of the president of the First National Bank and the president of the City National Bank of the city of New Orleans, praying for an amendment of the national banking law, so as to provide that private bankers, as well as banking associations established under national authority, may be subjected to the payment of the tax of ten per cent. upon the amount of notes used in circulation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COLE presented the memorial of Charles Louis Fleischmann, on the subject of the culture of forest trees on the plains; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That the petition of loyal citizens of Loudoun county, Virginia, on the files of the Senate, praying for compensation for property destroyed by fire, and for live stock taken for the use of the United States Army, or sold for the benefit of the United States by order of General Sheridan, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion by Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That the papers on the files of the Senate relating to the claim of Joshua Hall for compensation for eleven bales of cotton taken by military authority for the use of sick and wounded soldiers in General Steele's expedition at Camden, Arkansas, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. CORBETT, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom the subject was referred, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 46) in relation to an harbor at or near Point Sal, on the coast of California; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, during the period of ten years that I have occupied a seat upon this floor I believe I have never had occasion to correct a report of anything which I have said here; at any rate, if I have had I have not done so; but I find in the report of the debate yesterday, as published in the Chronicle and Intelligencer, and I suppose in the papers throughout the country, by the Associated Press, that I am made to do very great injustice to the Chief Justice of the United States. I am reported thus:

"Mr. Dixon said the appointing power vested in the Chief Justice was a great evil. It was already being used for political purposes. Applicants were certifying not only to their fitness, but to their politics."

Now, sir, I said no such thing. What I said is correctly reported in the Globe, as follows:

"But, sir, my principal objection is of another character. I think the Chief Justice is not the proper man to make these selections; not that I have not perfect confidence in him; no man on this floor has greater confidence in the Chief Justice of the United States than I have. I consider him as pure and spotless as he is able; but I say this is not the proper business of any Chief Justice. I do not wish to vest in the Chief Justice of the United States political power of this kind."

Now, sir, I merely wish to say that I do think the reporters in the gallery ought to be careful in giving the substance of what is said. I have no doubt they intend to be. They sometimes inadvertently do injustice. They have in this instance, in my judgment, done me more harm than they have done the Chief Justice. Such a charge as that, that this appointing power was already being used for political purposes, would be a charge upon the Chief Justice which, in my opinion, would injure him who made it far more than the Chief Justice himself. I hope the reporters will correct their report, and give what I did actually say, as stated in the Globe.

EDUCATION IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. HARLAN. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a resolution in relation to education in the District, have instructed me to report a joint resolution on the subject, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 43) in relation to the educational interests of the District of Columbia was read twice by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Commissioner of Education to ascertain the number of children resident in the District of Columbia over the age of six years and under the age of eighteen years, the number of said children that are blind, and the number that are deaf and dumb; the number and character of public school-houses, number of teachers and number of pupils in attendance, number and character of school libraries, character of text-books used, average period per annum each pupil is taught and cost of tuition, with incidental expenses of the schools, and to report to Congress at its next regular session, together with his opinion of the relative efficiency of the system now in force in the District, and whether any additional legislation is necessary in order to secure the advantages of the system to the children.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF SHIPS TO BELLIGERENTS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now desire to call up the bill (S. No. 94) declaratory of the law with regard to the sale of ships to friendly belligerents.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall go on with the morning business.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let me take this up, and then I will give way for the morning business.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it proposed to take that bill up for consideration now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves to postpone all prior orders and proceed to its consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will only state, that the Senate may know what will be the effect of taking it up for action now, that it will lead to quite an elaborate debate in all probability. It is a very important measure. The same measure was before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and is now before them. Whether it will be acted upon or not at this session I suppose is doubtful; perhaps it is certain it will not be; but at the close of the session to pass a law of this description, which may have a very injurious effect upon our relations with other nations, and especially may complicate the negotiations going on with England in relation to her liability for damages sustained by the commerce of the United States in consequence of the fitting out of privateers in her ports, and may injure, I think, from the little reflection I have been able to give the subject, our chances of being indemnified, it seems to me would be very injudicious. I can imagine that ship-builders in the United States would be anxious to fit out vessels such as they would be authorized to do under this bill; but to do so, while it might give them some three or four or five millions the present year, might lose to other citizens of the United States some ten or fifteen or twenty millions, and might also involve us in trouble with foreign nations. I only mention these facts that the Senate may know what the character of the bill is, and that it is certain to lead to debate which will consume the day, I suppose, and more than the day.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not think it will consume the day, or any considerable portion of the day. It is a simple commercial bill. The Committee on Commerce referred it on the 9th of February to the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] who has given it a thorough investigation. He has informed me that in his judgment it will not complicate our relations with foreign Powers, or interfere with the Alabama or any other claims. The petition upon which it is based is signed, not by ship-holders, but by the heaviest commercial houses in the United States.

Mr. CONNESS. Is it just reported this morning?

Mr. CHANDLER. No; the day before yesterday.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I object to the discussion of this matter now. Let us go on with the morning business.

Mr. CHANDLER. I want to take it up.

Mr. CONNESS. I object.

Mr. CHANDLER. Your objection cannot prevent it. It is in the hands of the Senate to take it up or not. The Senate can, if they see fit, take it up or they can vote it down. I think the bill ought to pass. It simply declares that in the future the United States, or any citizen of the United States, may sell any vessel to any friendly belligerent; but this proviso is put in:

Provided, That the transaction is simply commercial, with no intent on the part of the seller or charterer to participate in any belligerent act, and that the vessel or steamer while in transitu is in no respect exempted from the law of contraband.

It is a simple commercial measure which, in my judgment, will not complicate our relations with any other Power, and which ought to be passed. Of course it is in the hands of the Senate. I hope the Senate will take it up and proceed with its consideration.

Mr. CONNESS. It is very evident that this bill opens up questions of the greatest magnitude; and if it is to be taken up at all it ought not certainly to be taken up in the morning hour. I hope that the Senate will not take it up at this time.

Mr. SUMNER. On the question of taking up this bill I deem it my duty to repeat a statement which I made the other day when the bill was reported. This whole subject was referred by the Senate to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That committee proceeded at once with its consideration, and came to the conclusion that under the circumstances it was not expedient to legislate thereupon at this session. The bill referred to them was left on their table. I was not authorized to report it back to the Senate, for there was no conclusion reached as to what it might be expedient for us to do when we should come together again. I make this statement now with reference to the course of the Committee on Foreign Relations without any intention to prejudice the merits of the bill; but the Senator from California is right when he says it opens a great question. It opens one of the greatest questions that we have had occasion to discuss latterly. Clearly we ought not to proceed with it in the morning hour. If it is to come up, it should come up on notice before hand, that we may be prepared to consider it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I gave that notice yesterday.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This measure comes from the Committee on Commerce, where some little consideration was given to the subject; and in the view in which that committee would be expected to deal with such a question they were unable to see any objection to the measure. As a commercial transaction it is difficult to conceive that it would not be perfectly allowable for one of our own citizens to sell a vessel of American construction to a citizen of a foreign country. That is the proposition. Now, I say, in a commercial point of view, or even in the interests of the merchant marine of the country, or the ship-building interests of the country, it is very plain, it seems to me, that there is no objection to the terms of this bill.

I am sure, Mr. President, that such a bill would not violate any of the ordinary rights of a public character or ordinary principles of public law. I think nothing is more common in the intercourse of nations than the transactions contemplated by this bill. Nevertheless I can understand that the Committee on Foreign Relations may have different views on this subject, and that having charge of relations entirely foreign they may feel that there are interests which might be embarrassed, not perhaps by the terms of this bill, not perhaps by any legitimate deductions that might be deduced from this bill, but from a misapprehension of its character; and if I understand anything from the remarks of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, it is an apprehension that something might grow out of a misconception or misapprehension of this bill which would endanger our foreign relations in the present posture of affairs; and by that language I suppose he means to refer to the delicacy of our foreign relations.

Now, sir, the Committee on Commerce know nothing about that, except in a general way. The Committee on Commerce, looking at this bill as a measure suitable in itself, could not be expected, perhaps, to be as sensitive upon the class of questions to which the honorable Senator refers, as the Committee on Foreign Relations, who are charged particularly with questions of that sort, and who, he will allow me to say, are I think a little sensitive about questions of that kind. We could have no apprehension that a measure so plain, and so manifestly just as this appears to be in a commercial point of view, could endanger American interests anywhere, or that a proposition so plain as this would be liable to be so misconstrued and misunderstood as to affect the foreign relations of the country. I do not understand the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to raise any other objection to this bill. In fact, I do not understand him to hint that the bill is not in itself proper and suitable enough under ordinary circumstances; but, owing to the peculiar condition of our foreign relations, he suggests that it might as well be postponed.

Mr. SUMNER. I stated that such was the conclusion of the committee. The committee came to the conclusion on consideration that the bill ought not to be proceeded with now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And that on account of the delicacy of our foreign relations.

Mr. SUMNER. They did not undertake to pass definitively on the bill; but they came to the conclusion that it should not be proceeded with now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And very properly I think, the committee did not undertake to adjudicate on the character of the bill; for it is difficult for me to understand on the general principle of that bill what the Committee on Foreign Relations could have to do with it. It is entirely of a commercial character; but I can understand in the great solicitude—

• Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask my colleague whether it is not a question that may affect our neutrality laws?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is precisely the ground which I was suggesting.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; being so, I think it is very manifestly proper for the consideration of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There may be force in the suggestion of my colleague; and I was not arguing that in the view in which I understood the Committee on Foreign Relations to consider it, it did not properly belong to it.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon. The committee felt that the bill naturally belonged to them. Primarily, and in its most important aspect, it unquestionably is, as the Senator from Maine suggests, a question concerning our foreign relations. It undertakes to lay down a new rule of neutrality, or rather to lay down a rule of neutrality which it associates with our past history and with the decisions of our courts. It is manifestly a question for the Committee on Foreign Relations. If it concerns commerce, it is only in its secondary aspect.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. May I ask the honorable Senator whether he understands that it violates any treaty regulations or any rule of neutrality between this country and foreign countries?

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator asks me a question that if I answer would carry me into a discussion of the bill, which at this moment I wish to avoid. If the bill should be taken up for discussion I may be disposed to enter into it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So it all comes precisely to what I said: that the opposition from the Committee on Foreign Relations is based on the idea that in the peculiar state of the country we ought not to enter upon the consideration of the question at all. Well, I am not urging it; I am only saying the Committee on Commerce took cognizance of it without any such apprehension. If there is any well-grounded apprehension, then I agree with the Senator that we ought not to proceed with it. I am only saying so much in the way of justifying the Committee on Commerce for their action on this bill from their stand-point.

Mr. JOHNSON. The object of this bill must be—certainly that is the effect of it—to repeal the neutrality laws, particularly the last one passed in 1818, which, as I think, has contributed very much to the prosperity of the country. If by that law or any of the antecedent laws what is proposed to be done by this bill is not prohibited, it can be done without legislation. If it is prohibited by the existing legislation, then the question for the Senate is whether, in the present condition of the country in reference to its claims upon other nations and the tendency of such measures as this bill proposes to allow, would complicate us and involve us in foreign difficulties, it is advisable to alter our neutrality laws.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill for consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. On that question I will ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations whether, if the bill is taken up, he shall feel it his duty to oppose it. What I want to know is, whether it is going to lead to discussion?

Mr. SUMNER. The bill must lead to discussion. I know of Senators who are disposed to discuss it at length. I have already stated that the committee with which I am connected, on carefully considering it, concluded that it was better not to take it up during this session. I did not go into any statement further of my own views on the subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. I find that some gentlemen who are in favor of taking up this bill are opposed to taking it up during the morning hour. I do not wish of course to interrupt the morning business, and I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays. But I give notice that I shall at the expiration of the morning hour again move to take it up. I think it a very important measure, and a measure which ought to be passed at the very earliest moment. It is a measure which interests the entire commercial interests of the United States. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and give notice that I shall call it up after the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw his motion?

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I simply wish to make an inquiry. I find that the bill is entitled "A bill declaratory of the law with regard to the sale of ships to friendly belligerents." If two foreign nations are at war and the United States authorizes its citizens to sell ships prepared for war to one of the belligerent Powers, would not that be regarded as an act of hostility on the part of the United States? I know when the British Government allowed the rebels to prepare vessels in England to assist in their cause we regarded that as an act of hostility.

Mr. CHANDLER. That was simply because it was in violation of her own neutrality laws, and it is claimed that it is now a violation of our neutrality laws, the laws that we ourselves have passed. If you permit both belligerents to purchase, of course it is not an act of hostility. This is simply a declaratory act. Our just claim against Great Britain was that she violated her own law. Their claim against us is that we violated our own law. Under this declaratory law our citizens violate no law, neither do they commit an act of hostility by selling ships to either or both the friendly belligerents.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no doubt the honorable member has studied the question very thoroughly and has read the correspondence between our minister and the State Department and British Government on this subject; but according to my recollection—I may be wrong—the ground upon which Earl Russell placed the irresponsibility of the Government of England for the damages done by the Alabama and the other privateers is one which we shall hardly be prepared to controvert if we authorize the doing of what it is proposed to authorize by this measure. I know that the bill upon its face, at least I suppose that that is its object, is intended only to give to the citizens of the United States the right to sell vessels to a belligerent; but I suppose no one is simple enough to imagine that any ship-builder in the United States will undertake to build a ship that pretended to be a ship-of-war without having some understanding with a foreign belligerent; that she will thereafter leave the port of the United States the property of that belligerent, and if she does it will be precisely and exactly the case of what we said England permitted her ship-builders to do, and of which we complained.

But however that may be, Mr. President, I state to the Senate that the question, in my judgment—and in that I believe I have the concurrence of the judgment of the entire Committee on Foreign Relations—is a very important one, and one which we now have no time to examine. We are about to adjourn, as I trust, in a day or two. To pass a bill of this description, so recently before the session is to close, and to have it passed by the House, a bill which may involve the nation possibly in war, and at least certainly complicate the negotiations that are now going on between the United States and England in reference to the depredations made upon the commerce of the United States by vessels fitted out under circumstances which will, under this bill, authorize the fitting out of vessels of the United States to be used for the same purpose, seems to me to be inexpedient.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now on taking up the bill.

The motion was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk:

Mr. President, the House of Representatives has passed a resolution in these words, which I am directed to bring to the Senate for its information:

Resolved, That the House having been informed by one of its committees that testimony has been brought to the knowledge of said committee, which testimony apparently affects one or more members of the Senate, the House thereupon directs that copies of all such testimony be transmitted to the Senate for its information.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 107) to render applicable to drafted men, to seamen in the United States Navy, and to mariners the provisions relating to bounties in the act making appropriations for the civil expenses for the year ending June 30, 1867, approved July 28, 1866; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 111) to regulate the elective franchise in the United States; which was read twice by its title, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. VAN WINKLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 108) for the relief of Henry Great-house and Samuel Kelley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 109) for the relief of Jeremiah McChesney; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 110) to promote forest-tree culture on the plains; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 45) for the relief of Benjamin F. Small, postmaster at Carson City, State of Nevada; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. THAYER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 47) in relation to the removal of Indian tribes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 44) directing an examination and estimate to be made of the cost of reconstructing the levees of the Mississippi river; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. RAMSEY. If there is no objection, I should like to have the resolution considered at the present time. I presume there will be no objection to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to hear it read at length.

The Secretary read the resolution. It directs the Secretary of War to detail a competent officer or officers of the engineer department to make an examination of the condition of the levees of the Mississippi river and report a plan for their reconstruction and improvement from the mouth of the Ohio river to the Gulf of Mexico, with an estimate of the cost of the same.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to its consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no necessity for the passage of that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over under the rules.

Mr. RAMSEY. As objection is made, it had better be referred to the appropriate committee. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed. The motion was agreed to.

MINT LAWS.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to the Senate any information he may have relative to a proposed change in the mint laws of the United States upon the subject of the refining of gold and silver, and public policies incident thereto.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. NYE. I should like to have the mover of that resolution state in a word what is its object.

Mr. CONNESS. The object is to get information from the Department. It is a resolution calling for information.

Mr. NYE. About a change of the mint system?

Mr. CONNESS. Let the resolution be reported again.

The Secretary read the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

DISTRICT ELECTION EXPENSES.

Mr. WILLEY. As there seems to be no business before the Senate, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 24.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 24) relative to the payment of expenses incurred by the judges of election for the cities of Washington and Georgetown, District of Columbia.

By the first section the corporations of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, are required to pay, or cause to be paid, all necessary expenses, including printing, clerk hire, room rent, stationery, and a per diem compensation to each of the judges of election in the respective cities appointed under the act of Congress entitled "An act to punish illegal voting in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved February 5, 1867, of five dollars per day for every day they shall be actually employed in the discharge of their duties, and the certificate of the judges of election of either city, or a majority thereof, of the correctness of any account arising out of the action of the judges shall be deemed sufficient to constitute the same a legal debt against the city to which the judges so certifying shall belong. It is to be lawful for any of the judges of election to administer oaths in all cases relating to the duties assigned them by law, and any person willfully making a false statement under oath before any of them is to be deemed guilty of perjury, and on conviction thereof to be subject to imprisonment for the term of not less than two nor more than five years.

The second section directs the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia to appoint three commissioners of election in each voting precinct in the cities of Washington and Georgetown, who shall hold their offices for two years and until their successors are appointed and qualified, whose duty it shall be to take charge of the ballot-boxes at the polls at each election, to receive and deposit in the boxes the ballots of legalized voters in their respective precincts, to count the votes after the polls are closed, and declare the result, and make returns thereof as now provided by law. The commissioners of election are to receive the votes of all persons whose names are on the list of voters in the precinct, prepared by the judges of election, and none others; they are to have power to administer oaths, and to examine persons offering to vote, and other witnesses as to the identity of voters, and any person swearing falsely relative to the same is to be deemed guilty of perjury, and on conviction thereof to be subject to imprisonment for the term of not less than two nor more than five years; and to receive from their respective cities the same compensation for their services as is now paid to the commissioners of election in those cities.

The Committee on the District of Columbia propose to amend the resolution by striking out in line twenty-three of section one the word "two" and inserting "one," so as to read, "imprisonment for the term of not less than one nor more than five years."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the second section of the joint resolution.

Mr. WILLEY. On reflection, and after conference with some members of the Committee on the District of Columbia, it is thought best not to strike out this section, but to modify it and amend it before the question is taken on striking it out. I move to amend the section by striking out in lines twenty, twenty-one, and twenty-two the words "and shall receive from their respective cities the same compensation as is now paid to the commissioners of election in said cities."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. I further move to amend the section by striking out the word "two," in line nineteen, and inserting "one."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. Now, I hope the motion to strike out the section will not be agreed to.

The motion to strike out did not prevail.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. NYE. I have just picked up this resolution, and I desire to know whether any provision is made in it for the appointment of judges or commissioners of election?

Mr. WILLEY. A law passed at the last session provides for the appointment of the judges of election.

Mr. NYE. By whom?

Mr. WILLEY. By the chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, according to my recollection; but the Senator from Maine is more familiar with that subject.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator is correct. They are appointed by the chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

Mr. NYE. I see here a provision for the appointment of registers, and not of judges of elections. It seems to me both should be provided for.

Mr. WILLEY. There is no provision in this joint resolution for the appointment of registers. That is provided for by another law.

Mr. NYE. Very well.

Mr. WILLEY. I think there ought to be an amendment in the sixteenth line of the second section, by inserting after the word "voters" the words "and shall receive from their respective cities the same compensation for their services as is now paid to the commissioners of election in said cities."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

SENATE CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 83. It is a small matter of appropriation which it is necessary to take up at the present time.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 83) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate for clerks to committees, pages, horses, and carryalls, $15,000; for miscellaneous items, $30,000, and for salary of the clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, from the date of his appointment to the 30th of June, 1868, $2,898.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the bill by adding as a new section:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That section ten of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," passed at the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, shall not be construed to allow a greater compensation for the publication of the laws passed by Congress and executive proclamations and treaties in the papers in the District of Columbia than is provided by law for such publication in other papers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Contingent Expenses, offered the following amendment, to come in after line twelve of the first section:

To pay the expenses incurred under the resolution of the Senate directing the hydration of the atmosphere in the Senate Chamber, the sum of $7,500 is hereby appropriated, and added to the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Do I understand the Senator from New Hampshire to move that amendment from a committee?

Mr. CRAGIN. I move the amendment by direction of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUGGALAW,] who is on that committee, has had special charge of this matter, and introduced the resolution, which was passed by the Senate, directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to have the air of the Senate Chamber hydrated. The Sergeant-at-Arms has proceeded with the work, and it is nearly completed, and this amount is necessary to pay the expenses.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

MONEYS DUE COLORED SOLDIERS, ETC.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the joint resolution (S. R. No. 21) in reference to the collection and payment of moneys due colored soldiers, sailors, marines, or their heirs.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, after the previous recommitment of the joint resolution, reported it with amendments. The first amendment was to strike out all after the word "shall" in line twelve of the first section, and in lieu of the words stricken out to insert:

Hold the balance subject to the order of the claimants on satisfactory identification; but no money shall be paid to any person except the claimant, or his or her legal representatives, if deceased; nor shall any power of attorney, transfer, or assignment of the amount of said claims, or any part thereof, be recognized or allowed by the Commissioner, or by any officer or agent acting under him; and it shall be the duty of the said Commissioner, the officers, and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau to facilitate as far as possible the discovery, identification, and payment of the claimants.

Mr. WILSON. Since this matter was under consideration the other day the Committee on Military Affairs have reported an amendment, striking out all that part of the resolution that relates to the Freedmen's Bank, and inserting a provision referring the whole matter to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, who is himself responsible and may deposit the money where he pleases.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out all of the second section after the resolving clause and in lieu of it to insert:

That the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau shall be held responsible for the safe custody and faithful disbursement of the funds hereby entrusted to him. In settling with the attorney or agent of the claimant strict compliance with the scale of fees prescribed by the second section of a joint resolution approved June 25, 1866, entitled "Joint resolution amendatory of a joint resolution respecting bounties to colored soldiers and the pensions, bounties, and allowances to their heirs," approved June 15, 1866, will in every case be required and enforced; and if any attorney or agent shall, in addition to the notarial fees and expenses of collecting such claim, demand repayment for money loaned or advanced to any claimant, he shall be required to make oath to the date and amount of such loan or advance, or payment of the fees and expenses shall be withheld; and when the claimant shall have been properly identified, and his account is ready for settlement, the balance due shall be paid in current funds, and not in checks or drafts.

Mr. JOHNSON. I inquire of the chairman whether the Commissioner of the bureau is required to give bond for the faithful application of this money? If not, it is a departure from all our legislation.

Mr. WILSON. No other Army officer gives bond, I believe. The simple question is whether the money shall be paid into the hands of claim agents, to be by them transferred all over the country, or whether it shall go into the hands of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau for transmission to the proper parties. I have no objection to his giving bond, but this is imposing upon him a duty for which he gets nothing, and it is a great responsibility.

Mr. JOHNSON. No one has more confidence in the present Commissioner than I have, but it is departing altogether from the practice of the Government to place a large amount of money in the hands of any individual, official or otherwise, without requiring a bond.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to such a provision; but I think it is enough to ask him to do this work. We propose to have him do it for the purpose of securing the safe transmission of the money to those for whom the Government intends it. Since this matter was under consideration the other day, a case has come to my knowledge where $300 was due to a colored soldier and the claim was pressed by a claim agent, and he secured the payment of the money.

The man for whom it was intended, however, getting no money, began to inquire about it. The case was investigated, and the agent had to pay it to him; but he charged him a bill of sixty dollars. Mr. French states to me that there are many cases in which the greatest impositions are practiced upon these people. This proposition simply is that when a claim agent has carried a case through and has got the case decided, and the check is made out, that check shall go into the hands of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, who is to see to it that it reaches the proper person; and further than that, the claim agent is to have his proper and legal fees paid to him. He will have nothing to do with the money, but will get paid for what he has done, and then the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, through his agents, will attend to the proper distribution of the money and see that it is forwarded to the proper persons entitled to it. This is a great responsibility to put upon any man; but I have no doubt it will save hundreds of thousands of dollars to innocent and honest people.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is the effect of the amendment to take the money out of the Treasury and hand it over to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau?

Mr. WILSON. I will state the effect of it. A claim agent prosecutes a claim against the Government, and when it is adjudicated a check is given to him to be paid over to his client wherever he may be, and he forwards it to his client, or should do so, and I suppose in most cases does it. I have no doubt that generally the agents are honest, but there are cases coming to light every day of the contrary. Suppose a citizen of North Carolina enlisted into the service and is entitled to receive a bounty. Some agent prosecutes this claim, and the claim is admitted and the party is entitled to $300. A check for that amount is made out and handed to the agent, and the agent forwards it to the soldier in North Carolina. If he gets it, very well, provided the agent does not charge him more than the law allows. Instead of that course being pursued, under this joint resolution the practice will be that the check, instead of being paid to the claim agent, will be given into the hands of General Howard, and forwarded by him to the party entitled to it, so as to make it sure that he gets it; and the claim agent will receive from General Howard out of this money what the law allows him for his services, so that the claim agent will get all that the law allows him to receive, and the money will go through the hands of General Howard, who is responsible for it, and who is bound by the law to forward it to the party entitled to it, he having the record of where the man is and who he is, and being responsible that the money gets into his hands. This is an immense labor which is to be devolved upon him, and he is to get nothing for it, while he and his agents are to be responsible that the money gets into the proper hands.

Mr. French and Mr. Brodhead both recommend that this be done. I went up two days ago to the Department and had a long conversation with Mr. French in regard to it. He summoned up one of the officers of his Department who had the care of this matter, and he informed me of great abuses which ought to be corrected. The other day the opposition to the resolution seemed to come entirely from objection to depositing the money in the Freedmen's Savings Bank as then proposed, or in any bank. Instead of that we now provide that the checks shall be given to General Howard, who is to forward them to the proper parties, he being responsible for the money.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have failed to make myself understood by my friend from Massachusetts. If the money is to remain in the Treasury to give General Howard an opportunity of ascertaining to whom it belongs, I have no objection. The objection I make is not for the purpose of saving the interests of any claim agents. I have nothing to do with them. I am looking to the safety of the fund for the parties to whom we owe it. If the effect of the amendment is to transfer into the hands of General Howard the whole amount now in the Treasury to the credit of the fund, then I object to it, because no matter how honest General Howard is, and no man is more honest, it subjects the parties to whom the money is due to the hazard of its being lost. What is General Howard to do with it, provided he gets the whole fund? Where is he to deposit it?

Mr. WILSON. Some cases come up every day, and he would every day, if this resolution be passed, be receiving checks and sending them out. The probability is he could not accumulate anything of any amount, because the money as fast as it was paid into his hands would be paid out to the proper parties. At any rate, it will go no faster from the Treasury into the hands of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau than it goes into the hands of claim agents. It will be just the same in that respect. It goes out of the Treasury in either case, but it is believed to be safer in the hands of this officer than in the hands of various persons scattered up and down the country.

Mr. JOHNSON. That I have no doubt of; but I still fail so to explain myself as to make myself understood, or at least I think I fail in that respect. I do not know the aggregate amount now in the Treasury to the credit of these freedmen, but I believe it is near one hundred thousand dollars, if not more. What I want to know is whether upon the passage of this bill the whole of that money is to be handed over to General Howard and be kept by him, and then paid over to the claimants as they may individually present their claims. If it is to be paid over to General Howard in the aggregate, what is he to do with it? Is he to deposit it in a bank? Suppose the bank fails? These things are happening. Is it to be paid into what is called the Freedmen's Bank? That we objected to the other day. Or is he to keep it in his own chest? Then suppose he is robbed, are the freedmen to suffer? I suppose in that case we would provide for the payment to the freedmen of the amounts which they might respectively be entitled to claim out of the fund.

I repeat that in what I have said I have had in no way the interests of claim agents in my view, but have had the interests of these parties themselves. If the Senate think that the whole fund should be taken out of the Treasury, where it is certainly safe, and paid over to General Howard, where it may not be safe, no matter how honest and careful he may be, then they will say so. It seems to me to be rather dangerous if that is the effect of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I greatly misapprehend the scope of this bill, or otherwise the remarks of the Senator from Maryland do not apply at all. There is no money to go into the hands of General Howard as I understand it.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, the money will go into the hands of General Howard.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But only on checks.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will read the first section:

That all checks and Treasury certificates to be issued in the settlement of claims for pay, bounty, prize money, or other moneys due to colored soldiers, sailors, or marines, or their legal representatives, now residing, or who may have resided, in any State in which slavery existed in the year 1860, the claim for which has been or may be prosecuted by an agent or attorney, shall be made payable to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON. He draws the money.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly he draws the money on the check; but the soldiers' fund does not go into his hands at all. Instead of paying it to whatever attorney settles the claim the check is to be made payable to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, and the only duty or responsibility on him is to see that that check, or the proceeds of it, pass into the hands of the proper person. If that is so, then it turns out that the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau is not to have the fund in his hands. He is only the trustee of the check, and is bound to turn over the check or its proceeds to the proper person. That is all there is of it.

Mr. CORBETT. Are not the checks made payable to the order of the parties entitled to the money?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The expression is, "Shall be made payable to the order of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau." The only object I can perceive which the honorable chairman of the Military Committee has in view, is to make sure that this money shall go from the Government through such channels as shall insure its safe deposit in the hands of the persons to whom it is due. Heretofore the checks have been made payable to agents or attorneys, and from that great frauds have come. Now, it is said we will make these checks all payable to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau. He will draw the money on these checks, or pay the checks over to the persons to whom they are due. If that is so, then it is clear that there never is, in the estimation of this law, to be a fund accumulated in the hands of the Commissioner; and to accumulate a fund in his hands would neither be an honest execution of it nor in any sense a faithful compliance with his trust.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have examined this resolution as carefully as the brief consideration allowed us would permit, and I do not see anything objectionable in it; but I think it would be better to require this money to be paid out by the officers of the bureau under the same laws, rules, and regulations that apply to other disbursing officers. The legal effect of this joint resolution is simply to make the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau and his agents disbursing officers of all money due under existing laws to freedmen in the southern States. Instead of its being paid directly on draft to the freedman himself, or his agent or attorney, it is to be collected in the first instance by the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau or his agents through the southern States, and then paid over to the beneficiaries.

Now, if you require him to hold this money and disburse it in the same manner that a paymaster in the Army would, you have ample security, and these agents would become disbursing officers to the extent of the money due to the freedmen. As the bill is now framed the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau or his agents would draw the money, and they might if they chose deposit it with a bank, the national banks or a savings bank. We found it necessary only a year ago to prohibit disbursing officers from depositing money with the national banks, because a habit got up of the national banks paying disbursing officers a slight premium in the way of interest, and by that means we lost in this city alone $500,000. If these men are disbursing officers precisely like any other disbursing officers, required to hold this money in their hands under the penalty of the penitentiary in case they pay it out to any but the beneficiaries entitled to it, I see no objection to the bill, and probably it would facilitate and aid the freedmen in getting the money which the Government owes to them. I propose, therefore, to amend it by adding an additional section, which I have not yet put in form, that the moneys held or disbursed for these purposes shall be held and disbursed under the laws and regulations applicable to disbursing officers of the Army.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. The effect of that would be that they could not deposit the money anywhere else than in a Government depository, or have it on hand to pay the parties entitled to it.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to such an amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I offer this amendment as an additional section:

And be it further resolved, That all moneys held or disbursed under the provisions of this resolution shall be held and disbursed under the laws and rules and regulations covering other disbursing officers of the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 25) providing for the importation of certain works of art duty free, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 28) to increase the force in the Patent Office, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

AMERICAN ATLANTIC CABLE TELEGRAPH.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to take up Senate bill No. 28. It was under consideration about a week ago, and was laid aside to enable an amendment to be made at the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN.] I hope it will now be taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 28) to grant to the American Atlantic Cable Telegraph Company, of New York, the right of way and privilege to lay, land, and operate a submarine telegraph cable on the Atlantic coast of the United States, and establish telegraphic communication between the United States and Europe, via the Bermudas and Azores Islands.

Mr. RAMSEY. In order to answer the suggestion made by the Senator from Maine when this bill was up before, I move to amend it by inserting after the word "coast," in the seventh line of the first section, the words "except the coast of Florida;" and to make the same amendment by inserting the same words after the word "coast" in the second section.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not understand why the coast of Florida should be excepted.

Mr. RAMSEY. Because by the legislation of last year we gave the exclusive privilege to another company to lay a telegraph cable from the Florida coast to Cuba.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not understand that that was an exclusive privilege.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was exclusive, but the act reserved to Congress the right to alter, amend, or repeal it. There was a great controversy over that bill here, because, as first proposed, it was an exclusive privilege; but as the bill was passed, the right to alter, amend, or repeal it was reserved to Congress.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have no desire for this amendment, except in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. POMEROY. If this has the effect to repeal that, I am for it.

Mr. CONNESS. It ought to be done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not recollect that such a clause was inserted in the other bill. My recollection is that we were not able to insert a clause reserving the right to alter, amend, or repeal it. I should like, at any rate, to see how that bill reads.

Mr. CONNESS. I have before me the act referred to, being an act to encourage telegraphic communication between the United States and the island of Cuba, approved May 5, 1866; and the third section of that act is in these words:

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That Congress shall have power at any time to alter or repeal the foregoing act."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there the same provision in this bill?

Mr. CONNESS. We can insert it if there is not. There is, however, nothing exclusive in this bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. We can give the same privilege that this bill confers to anybody else.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did all I could to prevent the passage of the act of last year, until finally some one proposed an amendment reserving the right to alter or repeal it, and then I felt no further interest in the matter.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But if we have given to that company this exclusive privilege for fourteen years, would it be good faith before they begin operations to repeal that privilege or to alter it in any way?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would allow any company to lay a cable.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I contended against that exclusive privilege as long as I could, and thought we ought not to give the exclusive privilege, but the Senate did it.

Mr. CONNESS. With a condition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We retained the privilege to repeal it; but having voted to grant the privilege, I think good faith requires that we should not alter or repeal that act, or modify it substantially by giving rights to other persons in the same place, unless we see something in the conduct of those to whom the privilege has already been granted which justifies us in doing it, or something in the public necessities which we do not yet see. I contended against that exclusive privilege being granted, and I was very sorry that I did not succeed, because I thought it was bad policy. But as Congress adopted it and agreed to it, I do not think it would be fair to let another company interfere with them before they have had an opportunity to test their experiment.

Mr. CONNESS. The company who desire the passage of the bill now pending are entirely willing that it shall be amended in the manner proposed by the Senator who has it in charge. Consequently, it is not well to enter into a discussion of the question at this time, though I entirely sympathize, and did when the former bill was pending, with those Senators who objected to granting exclusive privileges, and believed that the reservation made would enable us to do just what is now proposed at any time. But yet I think it is wise at this time, in connection with this bill, to accept it in the form that the Senator from Minnesota asks it, namely, without infringement upon this exclusive privilege.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to amend the bill by adding as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That Congress shall have power to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that he had yesterday approved and signed the following bill and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. No. 22) in relation to a certain tract of land in Burlington, Iowa;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 26) providing for the necessary surveys for a ship-canal between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario for military, naval, and commercial purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 30) amending the ninth section of an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved August 30, 1852.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of March 12, a copy of the records of the retiring and revisory boards and of the proceedings in the matter of the dismissal of Captain Edward McDonald Reynolds from the Marine corps; which was ordered to be printed and lie on the table.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 28) to increase the force in the Patent Office, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

WORKS OF ART.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the Senate amendment to joint resolution (H. R. No. 25) providing for the importation into the United States of certain works of art duty free. The House amendments were to strike out the word "experimentation" and to insert "experimental purposes;" and at the end of the Senate amendment to add "provided, that this section shall apply only to steam plows."

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senate will concur.

The amendments were concurred in.

ALLEGATIONS AGAINST SENATORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the House having been informed by one of its committees that testimony has been brought to the knowledge of said committee, which testimony apparently affects one or more members of the Senate, the House thereupon directs that copies of all such testimony be transmitted to the Senate for its information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition will the Senate make of this communication?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have looked at the written testimony which accompanies this resolution of the House of Representatives; and there is also a printed volume of several hundred pages, perhaps four or five hundred pages accompanying it, a public document which I have had no opportunity to examine. I believe it has only been laid upon the tables within a day or so. I sent to the House of Representatives and got a copy of it, but I have had no opportunity to look into it. I have read the written testimony. I do not know what disposition the Senate would feel disposed to make of it, nor what disposition the Senators who are supposed to be affected by this testimony might desire to have made of it.

Of course a communication of this character from the House of Representatives is entitled to serious consideration. It makes the matter a serious matter by being communicated here. The written testimony is very short; it consists of the testimony of a single witness. It can be read in five minutes, I think, or ten at any rate.

Mr. SUMNER. Perhaps it had better be read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Unless the Senators referred to themselves have some objection to its being read I should think it would be well to have it read, and then if the Senate choose they can refer the subject to a special committee or to some of the standing committees.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. Do you refer to the testimony of Hull?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I refer to the testimony of Hull. The other is in print.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I have no objection to its being read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senators themselves have no objection, I think it would be well to read it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. So far as I am concerned I protest altogether against this pretended secrecy and covering up of testimony alleged to have been given, and this new disease of courtesy which seems to have attacked a certain committee of the House of late, although they have already published a volume to the world containing testimony and insinuations and innuendoes themselves bearing on the same subject. Mr. President, all this pretense of new-born courtesy in the concealment of testimony is a miserable pretext, which I denounce from the beginning. I demand that the testimony shall be read, and on the very face of it it will show that it is perjured.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I ask that the deposition of Hull may be read; and after it is read—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let it be read, if the Senators wish.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the written testimony received from the House of Representatives be read. If no objection be made the Chair will consider that the sense of the Senate. The testimony will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC EXPENDITURES,
WASHINGTON, March 19, 1866.

"Testimony of David A. Hull.

"WASHINGTON, D. C., Tuesday, March 19, 1867.

"D. A. Hull, having duly affirmed, was examined as follows:

"By the CHAIRMAN:

"Question. Where do you reside?

"Answer. My place of residence now is 393 First street, Washington city. I have resided in this city for thirteen or fourteen months. My place of residence before that was Poughkeepsie, Dutchess county, New York. My age is fifty years. For the last ten or twelve years I have been an insurance agent for a New York company. I am now employed in the folding-room of the House of Representatives.

"Question. Did you the week before last hear persons conversing in reference to the New York custom-house, the report of the Committee on Public Expenditures, &c.?" If so, state all the circumstances.

"Answer. On Wednesday or Thursday of the week before last, about one o'clock in the day, I was coming over to the Capitol, on my way back from lunch. As I came near the corner of A street, where there is a public house just before me; I followed close behind them, not thinking of anything particular, when I heard them mention the words 'New York.' I could not distinctly connect their conversation; but the moment New York was mentioned I tried to listen—that being my native State. I then heard the words 'custom-house' and 'committee'—the latter two or three times. I kept behind them the length of the walk going south, turned at right angles toward the Senate wing of the Capitol, passed up and kept on the pavement of the wing. I was close behind them, and I thought I knew one of them as Senator PATTERSON, of Tennessee, although I had never exchanged a word with him. As they came in the folding doors I was close behind them, so close that I passed in before the doors closed. As they got into the lobby the one whom I considered as Senator PATTERSON said to the other one, 'I have got my $5,000, and I do not care (I think he made use of the word damn) for the committee and all the rest of them.' I passed right in at that moment—it is pretty dark inside—and that is the last I saw or heard of them; I went about my business and I think they went up to the Senate Chamber. That is all I heard that I recollect.

By Mr. BROOMALL:

Question. Have you seen Senator PATTERSON?

Answer. Yes.

Question. What is your impression now as to whether he was really the man you heard using this expression?

Answer. I have taken a good deal of pains in the matter, for I felt interested in it. I have seen Senator PATTERSON twice since outside of the Senate Chamber, and he resembles the man so strongly that I have been almost ready to conclude that it was he. I cannot say certainly that it was.

Question. Do you know the other person who was with him?

Answer. I do not. I thought at the time he was a man whom I had seen in the Senate Chamber, and whose name is Senator DOOLITTLE; but I am not positive about it. I was satisfied at the time that the other was Senator PATTERSON; I have seen him twice since, but I never exchanged a word with him, and I should not know his voice if I heard it.

Question. Can you describe him?

Answer. I should think he was five feet ten or eleven inches, and stout.

Question. Was there anything peculiar about him?

Answer. Nothing at all that I discovered; I only knew PATTERSON by sight; had no interest in him, and had never exchanged a word with him, but I thought I knew him. Since then I have looked at the man, and I can almost say that I think it is the same man. But I am not positive. I tried to bring my mind to it, but I cannot.

Question. (By the CHAIRMAN.) Do you recollect what kind of a hat he wore?

Answer. I think it was a slouched hat, a sort of drab, sage color. I have seen him since with that hat, and I may have thus got things connected together; I know Senator PATTERSON now, and have seen him with two different hats—a slouched hat, and a silk high-crowned hat with a medium brim, and not very sleek at that.

By Mr. NOELL:

Question. Have you seen Senator DOOLITTLE since?

Answer. No, sir; not to know him. I never knew him by sight. I thought I knew PATTERSON as well as I know the chairman of the committee, but without ever speaking to him.

Question. You are not sure that it was DOOLITTLE?

Answer. No, sir.

By Mr. BROOMALL:

Question. Which was the taller man of the two?

Answer. DOOLITTLE I think, or at least the one who was with Mr. PATTERSON.

Question. How was he dressed?

Answer. In black.

Question. What kind of a hat did he wear?

Answer. I think it was a silk hat.

Question. (By Mr. BROOMALL.) If you did not know Senator DOOLITTLE what made you think it was he?

Answer. That is a question which has come to my mind two or three times. I do not know except that he resembled him, and that he was associated with Mr. PATTERSON.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Did you see the face of the other person distinctly?

Answer. I did not see his face. I only saw partially the side of his face.

Question. Do you recollect whether, when the remark was made by the person whom you suppose to have been Senator PATTERSON, "I have got my $5,000," there was any response or any motion by his companion, whoever he was?

Answer. I do not think there was; they were in the act of passing through the folding-doors. I was not more than three feet from them; the door had not closed; I put my hand up and kept the door open.

Question. Did either of them see you at the time?

Answer. I thought, and still think, that the man who I suppose was PATTERSON saw me; I stood sideways to him just as he entered, and he saw me standing right there when he made the declaration. He saw me. I have turned the thing over in my mind, and given it more care and attention than to any subject that ever came before me. When I commenced walking behind those gentlemen I supposed, and still do suppose, that I recognized one of them as Senator PATTERSON. I had no idea of this conversation taking place. When I heard the words "custom-house" and "committee" several times, I was satisfied, although I could not connect the conversation that they were talking about the New York custom-house. I then tried to hear what I could, but they talked low, and their faces were from me. When they got through the first pair of folding-doors, PATTERSON (if it were PATTERSON) turned and said, "Well, I have got my $5,000, and I don't care a damn for the committee or all the rest of them."

By Mr. PETERS:

Question. You heard no other remark?

Answer. No, sir.

By Mr. NOELL:

Question. Who was the first person to whom you disclosed this conversation?

Answer. An ex-Congressman named Tracy from Pennsylvania, who boards in the same place with me. He was a member of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, I believe.

Question. Have you ever been an applicant for any position in the New York custom-house?

Answer. Yes, sir, but not since Mr. Smythe's appointment as collector. I was an applicant under Mr. Simeon Traper and would have been appointed if he had not been removed. I was also an applicant under Mr. King, who promised to appoint me the day that he was first missing.

Question. And you never applied since then?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. Have you been an applicant for any other office under the Administration?

Answer. For none whatever.

Question. How came you to communicate what you heard to Mr. Tracy?

Answer. He boards in the same house with me. One evening, in conversation, the subject of the New York custom-house and of the report of the committee came up. I had read the report as published in the New York Times and I mentioned it to Mr. Tracy, and asked him if he had read it. He said he had not, and so I lent him the Times. I think it was either Wednesday or Thursday evening of last week that, sitting there together, I told him the conversation I had heard. That is the way I came to mention it. I mentioned it without thinking any harm or desiring to give it any publicity.

Question. Who was the next person to whom you mentioned it?

Answer. Mr. DRIGGS, the member of Congress from Michigan. He came in, sat down, and said: "Mr. Hull, Mr. Tracy tells me that you heard so and so." I asked him who had told him so. He said Mr. Tracy. I then gave him a statement, but not very particularly. I merely answered his questions; and the very next day, I think, he sent me up to the House, and I saw the chairman of the committee.

By Mr. BROOMALL:

Question. And that is the way the committee came acquainted with the matter?

Answer. I presume so.

By Mr. NOELL:

Question. Have you ever been advised not to communicate to the committee what you heard; or have you been threatened with any consequences if you testified?

Answer. Oh, no, sir. I have not talked with any one on the subject; and no one has advised me to do this, that, or the other.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of asking if that is all the testimony that is called secret?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is all except the printed matter.

Mr. JOHNSON. And that is all the testimony the House have thought proper to send to us that we may take action as against two of our own body. I forbear, Mr. President, to say what I think of such a proceeding as that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is a volume accompanying it, a public document.

Mr. JOHNSON. That I understand, but that was testimony taken some time ago.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. On a former occasion, Mr. President, I stated to the Senate and to the country that I had never received a dollar from Mr. Smythe. I now repeat that declaration, and I will state further that there never was any pending agreement between Mr. Smythe and myself that I should receive a dollar out of what is called the general-order business, as has been falsely alleged. I am an unsophisticated man, and I never understood until a few days ago what the general-order business was; I had an interview with Mr. Brooks, a member of the other House, and he informed me what it was. I never understood it before.

Now, this so-called testimony of a man named Hull is introduced. I do not know who he is. I simply say it is a sheer fabrication; it is a perjury from beginning to end. I never had any conversation with Senator DOOLITTLE or any other gentleman about this matter; and so far as this man Hull pretends to detail a conversation between Senator DOOLITTLE and myself or any one else he commits a downright and willful perjury. That is all I have to say. I am willing that this matter shall be referred to any committee. I do not care what committee you refer it to.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, one of the Senators mentioned in the deposition which has been read to the Senate is my colleague on this floor. The political relations existing between my colleague and myself are well known not to be of the most intimate character. I am not sure entirely that our recent political relations have not somewhat affected our personal relations; but I am pretty sure that they have not affected our personal relations to any considerable extent; and I know they have not affected the personal relations formerly existing between us to that extent which would allow me to sit here and hear a charge preferred against my colleague or any imputation cast upon him which I believed most confidently to be utterly unfounded; and now, without attempting to detain the Senate to discuss the testimony which has been published to the country or the testimony which has just been read to the Senate, I want to say two or three things, not more in justice to my colleague than in justice to the State which he represents here.

My colleague has been a citizen of the State of Wisconsin since sometime about 1850 or 1851. He was for many years a leading lawyer in that State, very widely known to the profession, enjoying a very large practice. He was for four or five years a judge of the circuit court in that State before he came to the Senate. I knew him for almost the whole time very well personally and by reputation, and I have great personal satisfaction in saying here, and I think it is due to the State that I should say it, that in all that time I never heard the slightest imputation cast upon him either for the conduct of business in the courts over which he presided or for the relations existing between him and his clients—never a whisper which could excite in the mind of any one a suspicion of his venality or corruption; and notwithstanding I know that the political course which my colleague has pursued during the last year or year and a half is not as I think, and as I am glad to believe, satisfactory to the people of the State of Wisconsin, yet I think I know that the imputation which has recently been thrown out toward him rather than upon him will create as much astonishment in the State of Wisconsin as I am sure it has created here in the Senate among those who have known him as I know it has created in my own mind.

Mr. President, I have not taken the trouble to criticize the evidence, or that which has been called and published as evidence. It had been laid before the country several days through the newspapers before I took the trouble to read it; and notwithstanding my eye happened to fall upon a newspaper which was sent to me with the testimony marked I did not take the trouble to read it until I found some reference to it in some of the newspapers of my own State; and I did then run my eye over that portion of the testimony which was supposed to bear upon my colleague. It did not create, I am bound to say, the slightest doubt upon my mind as to the personal integrity of my colleague.

I have one thing more to say, Mr. President; it is not in reference to what action should be taken by the Senate upon this communication; the Senate will judge of that; and I defer to those who have sat here longer and are more competent to give direction to it than myself. But I speak in behalf of myself as well as my colleague, I speak in behalf of every member of this Senate, I speak in behalf of every man who now or hereafter may be engaged in the public service, I speak in behalf of common humanity, when I protest against dragging any man engaged in the service of the country as we are to the bar of public opinion to answer for high crimes and misdemeanors unless there be ground laid for it in testimony, that which impresses the judgment of men as testimony, not mere declarations; there is a difference between the two. I insist that we have responsibilities enough to meet, and from this one we ought to be exempt; and I say this without undertaking to know that there is no foundation for these things; but when I say it I think I abundantly satisfy the Senate that whatever the actual fact may be, I am impressed by the most thorough belief that there is no ground whatever in truth or in fact for arraigning these Senators.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The kindness of my colleague in rising at this time, as he does, superior to all supposed party considerations thus to speak of me and my character quite overcomes me. The Senate will indulge me in a single word in relation to this testimony which has now been read in the open Senate. I state to the Senate that I have never in my life to my knowledge walked with Senator PATTERSON from the place indicated by the witness into the Capitol. I state most positively that Senator PATTERSON never made any such statement in my presence. I state also, and perhaps upon this subject I have a right to say that, after what transpired in the Senate the other day, on one occasion in conversation with Senator PATTERSON, he did state to me that the whole charge, the whole intimation that he ever received or ever expected to receive one single dollar, was without any foundation whatever, and I believe his statement.

I stated before this testimony was read, when I demanded and insisted that it should be read in the open Senate, that upon its face it would convict the man who gave it of perjury. He states that this occurred but the last week or the week before last, since Senator PATTERSON, in open Senate, made that personal explanation in which he denounced the whole charge as absolutely and unqualifiedly false. And, sir, is there a human being who will suppose that Senator PATTERSON, in the presence of a stranger, within three feet of him, looking him in the face, then stated boldly and openly that he had been guilty of this great crime? Sir, upon the face of that paper it is black all over with perjury. I denounce it as such. It is an outrage upon that Senator; and that any committee of the House of Representatives, sitting in secret, should take testimony of that kind, without giving notice to Senator PATTERSON is equally as great an outrage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I doubt whether it is in order to refer to the House in that way.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, when a committee of the House of Representatives refers to me I have a right to refer to that committee and its acts.

Mr. FESSENDEN and Mr. JOHNSON. Unquestionably.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My mouth is not to be closed, sir; and I will speak plainly. I intend to do so, and I shall strip their covering from their proceedings, and hold them up to the indignation of the Senate and the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I call the Senator to order. He cannot impute motives to the House of Representatives or any of its committees.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have not yet spoken of motives. I have spoken of their conduct, and of their conduct toward me; and if the Chair decides it out of order, I will appeal to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I do decide that you cannot impute wrong motives to the House of Representatives.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I appeal to the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if there be any doubt about the question of order, I move that the Senator be permitted to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, the Chair having believed it was out of order to impute motives to the other House, or to speak disrespectfully of them in the Senate, and as the Senator from Wisconsin avows it to be his purpose to do so, I refer the whole question to the Senate, whether he shall be allowed to indulge in that line of remark. It is a question on which I wish the sense of the Senate.

Mr. DRAKE. Is it in order to offer any remark whatever about the matter in its present position before the Senate? If it is I have one remark to make on the subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Maryland repeat his motion?

Mr. JOHNSON. The motion I made was that the Senator from Wisconsin be permitted to proceed in self-defense to comment upon the charges against him now before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to say that there can be no doubt that the Chair followed the literal language of the rule, which denies to a Senator the right to speak disrespectfully of the House of Representatives or any committee; but the Senate may waive its rule, and I submit to every man of feeling whether the Senate ought not properly to relieve the Presiding Officer from enforcing the rule in this case. I think it is a very proper motion to move that the Senate dispense with this rule so far as this case is concerned, and allow the Senator from Wisconsin to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the Senator from Wisconsin have leave to proceed with his remarks in his own way?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to say simply a word. I did not understand the Senator from Wisconsin as proposing to impugn the motives of the House of Representatives, or of a committee of the House; but he speaks of their action, leaving the inference to be drawn, if you please, as to what motive influenced them. I should be unwilling myself to open to discussion, or allow any Senator to proceed to impugn, the motives of the House of Representatives or the motives of a committee. I do not think that ought to be allowed. I should be very glad to extend to the Senator from Wisconsin full latitude to speak in his own language of acts that have been done, and I presume that is all he desires.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Wisconsin should be allowed to proceed with his remarks in his own way. The resolution of the House, it will be remembered, is to transmit certain testimony to the Senate, which the House says "apparently affects one or more members of the Senate." Here is a direct allegation on the part of the House that testimony has been taken before one of its committees which apparently affects a member of the Senate. The House stands here taking a position of quasi impeachment of a member of this body; and I humbly submit to the Senate that that member shall have the privilege of proceeding in reference to this matter, at this stage of the case, just exactly as he pleases; and then as soon as he shall have done so, I shall offer a resolution that the testimony which has been transmitted to us under these circumstances be respectfully returned to the House of Representatives.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish simply to say that there was nothing that I heard in the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin impeaching at all the motives of the House or of the committee. He was simply commenting upon the mode in which that committee had proceeded to take testimony, and the whole course of proceeding in regard to it. Whether that would be in order or not—and I am inclined to think it would be—the Senate should remember that this is a very peculiar case, one in which the personal honor and integrity of the Senator is involved. He ought to be allowed the largest liberty that can be possibly allowed to him to comment upon the whole of the papers transmitted, and all the circumstances connected with them. I should feel that a gross outrage was committed on him by the Senate if they refused him that liberty. Under the circumstances, therefore, I shall vote without hesitation for the motion of the honorable Senator from Maryland, that the Senator from Wisconsin be allowed to proceed in his own way to make such remarks as he thinks proper, because I am confident that he will break no parliamentary rule and outrage no parliamentary rule. His well-known caution and habit of using correct and proper language would forbid that. He ought to be allowed to proceed in his own discretion to comment upon the communication which has been laid on the table.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I will go a little further than other honorable Senators seem disposed to go in this case. I have been a member of the Senate, off and on, for near twenty-three years, and in all that time I never witnessed so great an outrage as this act of the House of Representatives in my opinion is in regard to these two gentlemen. I am willing that the Senator from Wisconsin shall use his own language and take his own time in his own defense. I sat beside him in this body for two or three years, in the next seat to him, and during that time I knew almost every sentiment of his mind, and I believe no more honorable man has ever sat in the Senate Chamber. He differs with me now in politics, and I disapprove of his course for the last year or so; but I knew him to be an honest, high-minded, and honorable gentleman. I think the manner in which this attack has been made upon him is most unjustifiable. It is cruel. It seems to me to be malicious. I never heard before of an attempt made to destroy the reputation of any man, no matter how low he might be, by such flimsy testimony as that which has been read to the Senate. Every man who is at all in public life is constantly subjected to attacks by bad men, and the more successful he is the more frequently he is attacked, abused, and vilified. I have experienced that myself, and I feel deeply in this case. I trust the Senator will not be interfered with at all, but suffered to use his own language and take his own mode of defense.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senator from Wisconsin be permitted to proceed in his own way, and use such language as occurs to him to be proper.

The question being put, the motion was unanimously agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will proceed in his own way.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I thank the Senate sincerely for the expression of their consent that I should be permitted to speak in my own way in response to these charges. I shall endeavor, however, in what I have to say to confine myself as nearly as I possibly can within the parliamentary rules of discussion.

On the 15th day of March last Mr. HULBURD, in the House, made an assault upon me which from his position I cannot suffer to pass without notice. He caused to be read in the House certain sentences from my speech in the Senate of the 6th of March, as follows:

"Mr. President, on Monday evening a newspaper was placed in my hand, in which I find a report of a committee of the last House of Representatives, submitted by Mr. HULBURD, of New York, which demands notice at my hands. It fills me with surprise and indignation. Without any notice to me, without calling upon me for any explanation, this report, by inference, and not by direct charge, by innuendo, not by positive averment, endeavors to create the impression that I received or agreed to receive $5,000 or some other pecuniary or other benefit from Mr. Smythe, the collector of the port of New York."

"This charge, whether made directly or by implication, whether sought to be sustained by proof or innuendo, is absolutely and unqualifiedly false, and from whatever source it comes I pronounce it a base falsehood, a vile and cowardly slander."

Mr. HULBURD goes on to say, in his speech of the 15th, that in this statement I do not deny "that there was an arrangement of the kind indicated." He says the report of the committee never charged that I "received a single dollar from Mr. Smythe or through him in any way." What arrangement is that which he by inference would affirm by saying that I have not denied it? He disclaims saying I received a dollar. There can be but one answer, namely: he intends to convey the impression that, while I did not receive a dollar, I made an arrangement with Mr. Smythe by which I was to receive some pecuniary consideration. He does not say so in direct terms, it is true, but insinuates it and leaves it to inference. Sir, you know, and every Senator knows, that I did deny in most positive and unequivocal terms any such arrangement. The very next sentence, which he seems purposely to have omitted, covers the whole ground. I repeat it now:

"I go further, sir, and say, that in the hundreds, and perhaps thousands of cases in which, during the ten years I have been in this body, my recommendation has been sought and obtained, there is not a single instance in which any kind of pecuniary consideration of the value of one cent was ever expected or received directly or indirectly by me; and I have yet to see that man upon this earth who would dare to look me in the face and make such an offer. Upon this and all other matters I am ready to meet the most searching scrutiny."

I have nothing to add to or subtract from that statement.

But this gentleman says that I called upon him a day or two after the report of the committee was made public. That is true. I did call upon him.

My attention was first called to this by a friend who placed in my hands the New York Times, on Monday evening, the 4th of March. It was the first notice of any intended assault upon my character from any source. I know Mr. HULBURD personally. I met him several times during the last session, and he never intimated to me that there was the slightest evidence implicating or tending to implicate me in the least degree in any wrongful transaction whatever. How was it possible that with one spark of honorable manhood left in his bosom he did not give me notice of what was going on to injure my character for integrity, which to me is of more value than all the wealth of the world? Sir, let him give the reason. Perhaps it is a sufficient reason. I use his own language. On the 15th of March, instant, in the House of Representatives, he said:

"For four years I have acted as scavenger among the filth and garbage of the investigations to which I have been assigned."

Here is a reason, perhaps it is a good philosophical reason, and a sufficient reason to be found in his calling and his avocation.

Yes, sir, this "scavenger among filth and garbage" has, I fear, been so long engaged in his dirty work that not only his senses of sight and smell, but his conscience and instincts have been so affected or benumbed that he sees nothing wrong in this attack upon the character of a member of the Senate.

I confess I felt indignant. It was an outrage beyond language to express that a committee of the House, sitting in secret, gathering up hearsay, mere rumor, loose conversation, which would not be heard in a justice's court, and which no jury would be allowed to hear in a case involving the slightest money consideration, should thus without notice or opportunity to meet and cross-examine witnesses, or to give proof or to make any explanation, submit and publish to the world a report involving the public and private character of members of the United States Senate. I go further, and would say the same if it involved even the humblest citizen of the United States.

Sir, to honorable men character is dear as life itself; and a committee which violates common justice, common fair dealing between man and man, common courtesy, and common decency even, would become fit instruments of a revolutionary faction to try in secret men doomed to the guillotine, whose first notice of their accusation would be conveyed in the order for their execution.

He says I felt "very much aggrieved." Aggrieved, sir? That does not express it. I felt outraged. I felt that the decent respect due to every member of this body was most grossly outraged and trampled upon. I felt more, that the reputation and character of every citizen was in danger of being destroyed at the hands of those scavengers in filth and garbage claiming to act in the name of a Government whose first duty it is to protect the rights, liberties, lives, and characters of its citizens.

I demanded of him to know upon what evidence he made such a report and published such charges. He said the evidence was at the Public Printer's. I spoke in strong terms, I acknowledge, of the course pursued, especially because a committee sitting in the same Capitol with members of the Senate had published such a report without giving them any notice or any opportunity to be heard. When he says that I seemed to have a "great desire to append a denial to the report" he is utterly mistaken. Why should I desire to append a denial after the committee had submitted and published their report to the world?

No, sir; I was in no mood to ask favors, and did ask none. I went there to find the evidence upon which the report was made and to denounce the outrage. There is hardly a human being upon the earth whose standard of conscience or whose intellect is so low or has become so benumbed by his occupation as to be unable to feel that this was a great wrong. He seemed to feel it. I have no doubt he did feel it, for he began to plead that he did not intend to do me wrong. He did not deny, however, that it was a wrong. He says, reading from the same speech:

"Afterward, upon reflection, I wrote a note to Mr. DOOLITTLE, which I sent over to him by one of the pages of this House, in which I stated that I did not wish to do him injustice, and that if I had done so I regretted it; that I would give him an opportunity to make any explanation or denial he thought proper; that as the report was closed I would simply ask that it should be dated, pro forma, on the 2d of March."

Yes, Mr. President, Mr. HULBURD did, on the 5th day of March, send me a note, which he dated back to the 2d of March, in which he says:

"I write you this note for the purpose of saying if you wish to make an explanation or denial in a word, I will append it to the testimony of the committee, to be published with the report."

And with that note he also sent me the following note, marked "private," which it is necessary to read to understand the whole facts:

"DEAR SIR: I would not intentionally do you wrong. If you will reply in a sentence or two to the accompanying and return it to me immediately I will append it to the testimony. Permit me to suggest that a reply should not go into any statement or argument, and should be limited to a sentence or two. Please, for obvious reasons, date your reply on the same day it purports to have been written. Respectfully yours, C. T. HULBURD."

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that in his note?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the date of that note?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The note was dated back to the 2d of March.

Mr. JOHNSON. When was it sent to you?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On the 5th of March. He states himself in his speech that I called upon him two or three days after his report was made public. The report was submitted on the 2d day of March. I called upon him on the evening of the 4th. On the 5th he sent me the note. On the morning of the 6th of March, when I referred to this matter in my personal explanation in the Senate, I had these notes in my hand; but I forbore to use them against one who had so deeply wronged me. Much as I was inclined to do otherwise, I stood upon the defensive only, and made a simple unequivocal and positive denial. I stand there no longer.

It will be seen that in his speech in the House he says that in his note he said he "would give me an opportunity to make any explanation or denial I thought proper."

This allegation is substantially and essentially a falsehood. I prove it by the record. In one note he says, not that I may make any denial or explanation I thought proper, but it must be "in a word;" and in the other that my "reply should not go into any statement or argument, and should be limited to a sentence or two." Is there a human being so blind as to believe that it was for the purpose of allowing me to vindicate my character when assailed that he said I must answer "in a word;" "that I must be limited to a sentence or two;" that I must be allowed to go into no statement or argument in answer to testimony I had never seen or heard, and could not see because it was in the hands of the Public Printer, and which I have never seen until this very hour? No, sir; no, this pretense is too shallow, this covering is too thin. It is adding insult to outrage to say it. The real purpose was to make it appear to the world that on the 2d of March, the day on which he submitted the report, he had given me an opportunity to explain, and if I had followed his suggestion, and in a letter of the same date had acknowledged I had that opportunity, he could then screen himself from that just measure of condemnation which every honest man must feel for the cowardly and assassin-like attempt to injure my reputation in a vital point.

Did he suppose that any man of ordinary sense could not penetrate motives so transparent, as easily to be seen through and through as one can look through a ladder?

It was to hide himself from the consciousness of this wrong, to save himself from condemnation for an act so outrageously unjust, that I do not hesitate to say if any Senator had published to the world a report against Mr. HULBURD or any other member of the House, based upon evidence taken in secret which he had never seen, without giving him notice and a fair opportunity to explain or to disprove, common justice would scourge him with a whip of scorpions. It was to save himself, not me, that "after reflection" he wrote that note.

Let us go a little further. Let us look at this note for a moment. It was written on the 5th of March, after the expiration of the Congress. Mr. HULBURD had ceased to be chairman of any committee. He antedates his letter to carry it back into the last session. He signs it as chairman of a committee already expired. It is nothing more nor less than a deliberate attempt at forgery of evidence or of a public document; a deliberate fraud upon the House of Representatives. True, it was not for the purpose of obtaining money, and therefore perhaps not felonious; but it was none the less an attempt at fraud and forgery, for the purpose I have already indicated. And, sir, what does he suggest to me in his private note but that I should join him in the same fraud and forgery?

Sir, I scorned his suggestion. Instead of antedating letters and forging evidence to screen him or to screen myself I made the full, complete, and unqualified denial of the 6th of March which I now reaffirm, sentence by sentence, and word for word.

Mr. President, as my son, Colonel Anson O. Doolittle, has also been assailed, although I have not yet been able to read the testimony of this committee, I may be allowed to say a few words by the indulgence of the Senate. He was at the Law University of Michigan, eighteen years of age, when the first call for volunteers was made in 1861. He came home at once to Wisconsin, enlisted as a private soldier, and aided in raising the first company at Racine, all young men. He was chosen lieutenant, served as such in the second Wisconsin regiment in the first battle of Bull Run, and remained in service four years. He was appointed a second lieutenant in the fourth cavalry by Mr. CAMERON, then Secretary of War, and for a long time commanded a battalion of regular cavalry in the Army of the West. He was under General Thomas in the terrible battle of Chickamauga, and after the retreat of our Army into Chattanooga, when Wheeler with the rebel cavalry crossed the Tennessee to cut off the supplies of our defeated Army, his command was a part of our cavalry forces which for twenty days and nights in succession pursued, fought, and skirmished with Wheeler's rebel forces until they captured all his artillery and drove him into the Tennessee, in whose swollen floods hundreds of the fleeing rebels were drowned.

He was afterward appointed lieutenant colonel of the thirty-seventh Wisconsin volunteers, which he commanded under General Wilcox, of Michigan, in the assault and capture of the railroad cut under a terrible fire in front of Petersburg, for which, upon the recommendation of that general, he was brevetted for distinguished gallantry in that battle as colonel of volunteers.

I would not have said thus much had not this young man been most unjustly assailed, not for any wrong that he has done or contemplated, but because, being my son and having broken up his professional studies to give four years of his young manhood to the service of his country, he has accepted the position of a weigher in the New York custom-house. This is the whole of his offending in fact. To this position he was appointed to fill a vacancy occasioned by death, and not by removal.

As to the allegation or intimation that he had contemplated or made some other arrangement, never carried out, with Mr. Thompson or any other person, which in some way was improper, illegitimate, or dishonorable to him or to me, I have to say that upon all the information that has ever come to my knowledge, and upon all that I can learn, I deny in most emphatic terms that he ever entered into or contemplated or entertained for one moment any proposition which was not in itself perfectly legal, perfectly honest, and perfectly honorable to him as a citizen and as a soldier.

I have only to say, in conclusion, that the intimation or suspicion that Mr. Smythe made any agreement with me to give my son any sum of money or any interest in the "general-order business," in order to obtain my influence in procuring his nomination or confirmation, is not only a falsehood, but a most silly falsehood. Mr. Smythe was recommended for that place by an amount and weight of character in the city of New York among the business men hardly ever equaled before. Boards of Trade, Chamber of Commerce, leading bankers and merchants all seem to concur in his favor. It is true politicians in New York were very much divided on the subject, and the President could not appoint the candidate of one set without offending others, and upon the whole concluded to appoint Mr. Smythe, not as a politician, but as a collector of customs at the port of New York. As a friend of the President I agreed with him in that opinion. He was nominated, and was I think confirmed unanimously by the Senate, and sustained by nearly all the press of the city of New York. I repeat, it is not only a falsehood, but a most silly falsehood, that "he (Mr. Smythe) had to agree to give a portion of the general-order business to Senator DOOLITTLE's son before he would be confirmed." Mr. Smythe swears that this allegation is absolutely false. I know it to be false. In fact I do not remember to have heard of any such thing as the "general-order business," nor did I ever know there was any such thing in the business operations of New York until after his appointment and confirmation; and it had nothing to do, directly or indirectly, with my action in relation to either.

Sir, I know not how it may strike others; but it does seem to me, and I suggest it to the Judiciary Committee, that there ought to be some law to regulate the conduct of these secret investigating committees in taking and publishing the testimony of witnesses involving or affecting the character of citizens, and to prevent them from being abused and used as star-chamber inquisitions.

Mr. President, I shall concur entirely in any disposition that the Senate may think proper to make of this subject; whether to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary, or any other course that may be pursued.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not propose to reply to the Senator from Wisconsin; but I cannot fail to express my astonishment at the extraordinary scene that has been presented to the Senate to-day. Here, for nearly three quarters of an hour, the Senate, departing from all their rules, have permitted the Senator from Wisconsin to make a most extraordinary attack upon a member of the House of Representatives from the State which I have the honor in part to represent here, which fills me both with astonishment and alarm. Mr. HOLBURN is well known in the State of New York. He has been a member of the Legislature several times. He has been a candidate for the Speakership of that body. He has been for several years chairman of the committee of ways and means in the Assembly of New York; and he has been for three or four terms—my colleague will correct me if I am in error—a member of the national House of Representatives; and in every place that he has occupied he has had the respect, the esteem, and the confidence of the people of the State of New York. And I now declare that he has not written one word, nor has he made a statement, that he does not believe to be true. Saying this, and also saying that he is as pure a man as any member of this body, I leave the question to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. DRAKE. I now offer the resolution which is lying on the Secretary's desk.

Mr. FOWLER. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me to make a few remarks I shall be very much obliged to him.

Mr. DRAKE. In a moment. The Senator's remarks will be in order upon this resolution. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the testimony transmitted by the House of Representatives to the Senate, with the statement that it "apparently affected one or more members of the Senate," be respectfully returned to the House.

Mr. DRAKE. It is manifest to all the Senators present that the matter which has been brought to the attention of the Senate this morning has two aspects: first, that which has led to the Senate conceding to the Senator from Wisconsin the privilege of proceeding with such remarks as he pleased to offer to repel the imputation made against him; and secondly, that which relates to the action of this body upon the testimony presented under the resolution of the House of Representatives. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin and the honorable Senator from Tennessee have both made their statements with regard to this matter to the Senate; the former under the express leave of the Senate to shape his remarks as he pleased.

Now, sir, the question comes up here, what shall the Senate do with this testimony which the House of Representatives has sent to it? Shall it refer it to a committee to institute an investigation with reference to the Senators who are "apparently affected," as the House says, by this testimony, or shall it lay the whole matter on the table; or what shall it do with it? I have embodied in that resolution the view which I think the Senate should take of this matter: that there is nothing in the testimony which has been sent here by the House of Representatives which even so "apparently affects" any member of this body as to require even a reference to a committee, or that it should continue to lie on the table of the Senate. My opinion is that it should be sent back to the House of Representatives just in the terms expressed in the resolution which I have offered. I say there is not a lawyer in the Senate who would ever counsel the institution of any proceeding against any man under any circumstances upon such testimony as that which has been sent here. Much less, therefore, should we, as Senators, entertain the idea that a cloud has been sufficiently cast over the name of any Senator to justify any action of the Senate whatever on such testimony. I hope, sir, that for the protection of this body and of every individual member of it, not only at this time, but in all future times, such an answer will be given to the House of Representatives as will cause more circumspection hereafter in their decisions, that testimony of this description taken ex parte "apparently affects" the character, public or private, of Senators of the United States; and I think the only way to convey that intimation is by returning the testimony to the House of Representatives without any comment or note from the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, anything that affects the personal character of a member of the Senate or a member of the House will always create feeling. It was perfectly natural that the Senator from Wisconsin should feel keenly the imputations cast upon him by a committee of the House. We, therefore, naturally excuse any harshness of language, or perhaps language that would not be allowed under the rules. Whenever a man is assailed he must speak in the language of indignation, and therefore it is proper, and I think right, that the Senator should express himself in just such language as he saw proper, not only against the accusation, but against the accusers, and all who were instrumental in it.

But, sir, since he has performed that right and that duty, the Senate of the United States must perform its duty. This testimony has been sent to us by the House of Representatives. It was sent without reading. The testimony that has been read is rather of a frivolous character; there is no doubt about that—in the nature of hearsay—and on the question of identity is scarcely deserving the weight of testimony; but still it has been sent to us with a large mass of printed matter we have not read. It seems to me that the Senate ought to pursue the ordinary course with this subject: send it to the Judiciary Committee in the ordinary way without further debate. But the idea of sending this testimony back to the House, throwing it into their teeth, it seems to me would be disrespectful to the House and undignified in the Senate—reversing the ordinary course of proceeding.

I do not think the House of Representatives intended any disrespect to the Senate. This testimony was not read in the House. We are bound to view their action in the most favorable terms? They find that by one of their committees testimony has been taken that affects, as they say, or that appears to affect one or more members of the Senate, and they send it over for our action. They modified the language of the resolution of the committee. The resolution of the committee, as reported, used the word "implicated," and they struck it out—

Mr. DRAKE. "Inculpated."

Mr. SHERMAN. The words are the same; and the House used a word of milder meaning, simply that it "affects" a member of the Senate. Under these circumstances, it seems to me, the proper course is for us to refer this matter to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I make that motion.

Mr. HOWARD. However painful may be the testimony with regard to the members of this body at this time, however accusatory it may be in its nature, I think the Senate are bound to indulge toward the House of Representatives and its committee the usual presumption, that persons charged with public duties act in good faith and not for the purpose of doing private injuries to any one. We are bound to presume that the committee who took this testimony acted fairly, honestly, and in good faith even toward the persons who have been affected by it; and surely we are bound to presume that the coordinate legislative branch of the Government who have sent this testimony to us for consideration have acted in equal good faith. They have seen fit to treat this testimony as of sufficient weight and importance to attract the attention of the Senate to it, and have sent it to us for that purpose. Surely it is to be presumed that the House of Representatives do not regard this testimony as entirely false or frivolous; and out of respect to the House, and out of respect even to the gentlemen themselves who are affected by the testimony in this body, it does seem to me that we ought to refer the testimony to some standing committee of the Senate with an instruction that they should pursue the investigation fully, fairly, and honestly, giving the persons affected by it an opportunity to appear before them with counter testimony, if they shall so see fit, in order that the Senate and the country, and especially the gentlemen of this body who are affected by the testimony, may have a perfectly full and clear showing and explanation of this whole matter. I trust, therefore, that the motion made by the Senator from Missouri will not be adopted, and that we shall refer the matter to a committee of this body.

Mr. FOWLER. I was not in the Senate when this subject came up before or I would have taken the liberty of stating then what I wish to state now.

I will say that without attempting to disprove the manner in which the subject has been spoken of to-day by the two Senators accused, I should have been pleased, and I wish they had contented themselves with a simple denial of the charge. Entertaining as I do for them the kindest feelings, and believing them perfectly guiltless of any participation whatever in the guilt imputed to them, I wish they had contented themselves with imputing no dishonor, no unfairness, or anything of that kind to either the members of the committee or the House, or to the witnesses that testified on the subject. I know, indeed, that it is very natural for us—

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. If my colleague will allow me, I will say—

Mr. FOWLER. If my colleague will wait I shall do him full justice on the subject, and I do not think I shall speak with passion or prejudice in the case. I shall treat the subject precisely as if it were an imputation upon myself. I know, indeed, that it is perfectly consistent with our disposition to treat with indignation any such imputations as these; but at the same time I do not forget, and I will not forget, that this is the Senate of the United States, and that the persons who make this charge are the Representatives of the American people, and must be treated with respect as becomes them. I had hoped that this subject would have been referred, as has been proposed by the Senator from Ohio, that it may receive a careful investigation, and if the charge be found untrue, as I am satisfied it will, it would have been the best vindication of the Senators that could have been made.

I did not rise, however, so much to make any remarks on this subject as on a subject that is a little foreign to the question before the Senate; and although I know it is somewhat out of order, I hope the President and Senators will indulge me for one single moment; and that is in reference to a report that was made some time ago in which the names of two ladies of my State were involved. I wish, if I can speak on this subject as it merits, to say a few words. I know the character of Mrs. Stover and Mrs. Patterson, two excellent and amiable ladies from the State of Tennessee, whose names were dragged before us, I think, with all due respect to the House and to the Senate and to the American people, without evidence which would justify any gentleman in bringing the name of any American lady before the public in such a manner as that. I will state this for them, that two more amiable, worthy, modest, conscientious, upright women are not to be found in this country. I know of no persons who will respond more quickly to all the demands of humanity than those two ladies. I know also that they came to the city of Washington with great reluctance, knowing well that their position would necessarily bring them before the public in a manner which was not pleasant to them. I know, too, that they have labored under great disadvantages and under circumstances sufficient to crush the feelings of any lady to discharge their duties, and to render the executive department acceptable to the American people. I had thought that the circumstances under which they were placed would have called for them the sympathies, the aid, and the respect of every true American to support them in their arduous duties. They have discharged those duties, I think, most acceptably to those who have been observant of their position.

I beg leave to make this remark in vindication of the character of those ladies; and I regret very much that the gentleman in New York, against whose integrity and whose character as a gentleman I shall not impute a single word—I mean Mr. Smythe—has been so imprudent as to mention their names at all. I think it was wholly improper and entirely wrong. I should not have made these remarks had any gentleman in the House of Representatives at the time the subject came up stated anything in their behalf, and I regret now that I am forced to do it.

I hope the Senate will make the disposition of this entire subject, with due respect to my colleague and the Senator from Wisconsin, that has already been proposed, such as will show the whole country that the Senate entertain a proper regard for the character of their members here, as well as for the character of this body, and also of the House of Representatives of the American people.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, too much allowance can hardly be made for the indignation a man may feel when his character is injuriously drawn into question. I am able, I trust, to make due allowance for the warmth, the intensity, the exaggeration of utterance into which one might naturally be betrayed, even in remarks prepared beforehand, did he stand in the position of the Senator from Wisconsin; but I cannot listen in silence to an attack so extraordinary in all respects as that which the Senator from Wisconsin has made upon Mr. HULBURD, one of my colleagues in the House of Representatives.

Mr. HULBURD, as a citizen of New York and as one of her Representatives, deserves vindication here, and deserves it from me. His representative and personal character has been somewhat within my observation. I served with him during the whole of the last Congress in the House of Representatives. I have known him for years, during which he has occupied, and occupied with credit, the various positions to which my colleague here has referred; and I deem it fortunate for CALVIN T. HULBURD that there is a community, great and intelligent, who know past anything that I can say, past anything that can be uttered by any member of this body, whether he deserves to be gibbeted at the cross-road of public opinion upon such allegations as have been brought against him. Sir, I concur with my colleague entirely when he says that Mr. HULBURD has "set down naught in malice;" that he has asserted nothing which he did not believe it his duty to assert, charged as he was with the responsibilities which rested upon him.

Sir, nobody need be more delighted than I am with the esprit du corps which has been so manifest and demonstrative in this Chamber on the present occasion. It is refreshing to witness the disposition which makes every man spring to his feet when the honor of a member of this body is impugned. But, sir, let us look a little at the facts; the facts as they relate to Mr. HULBURD; because I am not going to say anything now in regard to charges affecting the Senator from Wisconsin or the Senator from Tennessee. I only know of this evidence so much as has been read here. What there is in the printed volume I do not know, having been unable to read it, or even as other Senators seem to have read some resumé of it in the newspapers.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to make a suggestion at this point?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. DRAKE. The resolution of the House does not make any reference whatever to any printed matter sent to the Senate by the House. It simply refers to testimony; and that testimony is here, a copy of it in manuscript, which was read at the Secretary's table.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member from Missouri is under a misapprehension about that.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Maryland will allow me, it is my misfortune to differ with the Senator from Missouri in this regard. The resolution which came here does, in clear language, transmit to the Senate all the evidence taken by the committee, be it more or less, which, however remotely, reflects upon any member of this body; and therefore the whole printed evidence, manually sent here, as it need not have been, because it was upon our tables in theory of law, is a part of the evidence of which I am speaking. I have not read it, and have nothing to say now of what it proves.

I was proceeding to say that Mr. HULBURD, being chairman of one of the standing committees of the House, not chairman of a special committee moved or instigated by himself, but chairman of a standing committee, was, with his associates, charged to make a certain investigation. What was it? Did it aim at the Senator from Tennessee or the Senator from Wisconsin, or any other member of this body? Not at all. It aimed at suspected abuses in the administration of the public business at the port of New York. He entered upon that investigation, as it was his duty to do; and I regretted that the Senator from Wisconsin saw fit to reflect upon him for acting as a "scavenger," tripping upon some expression which Mr. HULBURD seems to have employed in the haste of debate. Whether termed in one way or another, it was his duty to investigate the matter which was given him in charge. He did so. In the course of that investigation, incidentally and unavoidably, so far as regards any prevention the committee was bound to adopt, the testimony came out here and there, and again, which did in some degree "apparently affect," in the language of this resolution, a member, or more than one member of the Senate. That testimony was reported to the House. All the testimony taken was reported. Was any impropriety committed in reporting it? It was obligatory upon the committee to report it, and the committee did report it, accompanied, I presume, with a recitation of the conclusions it tended to establish. I do not understand the report itself to be assailed for what it contained not found in the evidence, nor for what it omitted which could have been found in the evidence.

That being the state of the matter, the Senator from Wisconsin, in his place here, put in denials touching himself, as did the Senator from Tennessee. Both of them—I remember more particularly the expression of the Senator from Tennessee, because it required, in his own estimation, an apology to the Senate for the strength of the language—both of those denials, if they did not directly bring into question the integrity of the chairman of the committee who had submitted the evidence and made the report, at least impugned his action so far as to involve his integrity or that of the committee.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. Will the Senator from New York yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CONKLING. With great pleasure.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. In the strong language that I used on a former occasion I did not mean to reflect upon the committee at all. I reflected upon the testimony, not upon the committee, because I did not suppose any member of the committee intended to do me injustice. I am satisfied they did not.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I am speaking with nothing before me, with no opportunity to look, as I had had no occasion to look, at anybody's language, and must therefore rely upon my recollection of the statement as I heard it. But I ask the Senate, and I ask the Senator from Tennessee, whether the essence of his statement was not that the assertion or allegation made by this committee—perhaps his expression was "a charge made by the committee"—was false, adding a very strong measure of falsehood?

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. Yes, I said so; but I referred exclusively to the testimony, not to the conclusion at which the committee had arrived. I did not reflect upon the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. Well, Mr. President, it may be so. The use of terms is critical, and the understanding of terms is critical. Mr. HULBURD understood evidently that he and his committee were assailed, and accordingly, in his place in the House, he replied, endeavoring to show that he had done the duty with which he had been charged, and nothing more.

The next we hear of these proceedings, the House having revived its committee and instructed it to continue its custom-house investigations, without any connivance or action of any sort by the committee, as appears from cross-examination of the witness Hull, which has been read, there is brought to the knowledge of the committee, by a member of the House, the existence of a witness who has something important to relate. His testimony was taken; taken after the Senator [Mr. DOOLITTLE] had complained in this Chamber that the committee had delivered to the House, to be made public, testimony which reflected upon him without giving him notice; and, having taken the testimony, in place of pursuing the second time the course for which it had once been taken to task, namely, publishing such evidence, the committee went into the House and informed the House that evidence had been taken which "apparently affects"—a very mild meaning, as the Senator from Ohio says—"apparently affects one member or more than one member of the Senate." They reported to the House, and asked it to be transmitted to the Senate.

I shall not discuss the question whether this was the best mode of proceeding or the reverse; whether it was wise or not. I am simply vindicating the chairman of that committee from what I deem the excessive assault which has been made upon him. What was he to do with this evidence? Should he report it again to the House, and thus to the country, that the Senator might complain once more that evidence had been taken which affected him, and yet no opportunity had been afforded him to say whatever he might choose to say in regard to it? It might have been disposed of in several ways. I am not discussing, I repeat, the question which would have been best; but I am submitting to the Senate that the chairman of that committee did nothing malicious, and had no motive to do anything unfair or unfriendly, much less any act deserving to be characterized and stigmatized as he and his acts have been by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Now, sir, that evidence comes here. What it proves we know in part, because we have heard it read in part. As to the rest we know nothing. The question is before the Senate: what direction shall it take? I am not going to make any suggestion with regard to that. I have no knowledge of the merits of this matter as regards the charges against the two Senators understood to be referred to. But, sir, I submit that there is nothing here which warrants the Senate, as to the House of Representatives, or any committee or member of it, in assuming an impropriety, a wrong, or anything else which goes one inch toward justifying the remarks which have been listened to to-day.

This note, which was addressed by the chairman of the committee to the Senator from Wisconsin, we have heard stigmatized as forgery, safe from felonious prosecution because no money waited as an inducement upon its commission. I think when the Senator from Wisconsin reflects coolly upon that part of his remarks he will agree with me that in what the law calls furor brevis he has gone far beyond reasonable bounds.

That note, as I heard it stated by the Senator, seems to have been nothing but the suggestion of a mode by the chairman of the committee in which the Senator could have the opportunity to correct any mistake or injustice which had grown out of the lack of opportunity before. As he says, the session had expired by law; the chairman had ceased to be chairman of the committee. He says, therefore, to the Senator, although the clock has struck the hour which divides the old session from the new, although we have crossed that isthmus not wider than a hair between now and then, put in your statement; let it be done in the language of the note nunc pro tunc. Who was that to harm? What is there in it which should induce a Senator to rise here and denounce and stigmatize it in the unmeasured manner in which the Senator has seen fit to indulge?

Now, sir, I have said about this much more than I intended; but before I sit down I wish to say again that the day is far hence when I will sit in this presence or in any presence and listen in silence to aspersions so gross, heaped upon the head of a man so pure, so respectable as he whom the Senator from Wisconsin has seen fit to assail. I believe that he has done his duty; that if he has committed an error in doing it, it is an error of the head and not of the heart; I believe also that any committee which shall have charge of this subject will find nothing to attribute to him in derogation of the high character which here and everywhere I am glad to assign him.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, when this matter first came to the consideration of the Senate I stated, I think substantially, that it was a communication from the House of Representatives which the Senate was bound to treat with due consideration. However inconclusive or trifling the testimony which has been read may have seemed to some members of the Senate who listened to it, I think we should do nothing in passion, or from impulse, or in haste in regard to it. I have sometimes been censured for my course in this body for objecting to inconsiderate action, because I have opposed the passage of measures upon the impulse of the moment. I have done so in the discharge of what I believed to be a public duty, and I feel that it is improper that we should act in that spirit now. If the House of Representatives has made a mistake (which I shall not assume) it will be no excuse for us to make another. It is one of the branches of the legislative department of the Government. They have sent to us a communication, which we must treat with proper respect and decorum; and I am utterly opposed to any such proposition as that offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Now, sir, I shall be glad if this subject can be disposed of by a reference to a committee. I believe a motion was made by the Senator from Ohio to dispose of it in that way; but if this discussion is to be continued, I think we had better lay this matter aside and proceed to the consideration of the bill which the President has returned to the House of Representatives with his objections, and which has been re-passed there; and I move that the subject under consideration—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we can dispose of this now.

Mr. JOHNSON. We can take the vote in a moment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If there is to be no other speaking, I shall not interpose the motion I intended to make; but if there is to be any further debate, I move that this subject be laid aside and that we proceed to the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives with the objections of the President.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope this will be committed first.

Mr. MORTON. I believe when this affidavit was read here there was a just feeling of indignation among Senators. It was frivolous, flimsy, and improbable; and the only importance is derived from the fact that it was sent here by the House of Representatives. I think, however, that this subject ought to be referred to the committee, not out of any respect to the evidence that has been read here to-day, but out of respect to the House of Representatives. I think it better for the Senators themselves before the country that it should be so referred. That that committee will do them full justice and will vindicate them properly I have no doubt. I hope it will be referred to the committee.

Mr. DRAKE. When I offered the resolution which I did I supposed that the only evidence before the Senate was that which was read here this morning. I understand the honorable Senator from New York, who addressed the Senate just now, to state that there is other evidence there in that printed volume, and if I mistake not the honorable Senator from Maryland seemed to concur with him in that statement. If that is so, then as nothing from the printed volume has been read here, and we know not its contents, I would have no objection to have the reference made to the committee; but if the case stood before us now simply upon that written statement which was read this morning to the Senate, then I say the self-respect of the Senate would forbid its entertaining the proposition for one moment. I would inquire of the honorable Senator from Maryland whether I was right in supposing that he concurred in the statement made by the honorable Senator from New York as to what is really before the Senate now from the House of Representatives?

Mr. JOHNSON. I did.

Mr. DRAKE. Then, Mr. President, out of deference to the opinion of those two honorable Senators, that the printed matter is before the Senate and that the Senate knows not what is in that printed matter at all, I will, with the permission of the Senate, withdraw the resolution which I offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not ask for the reading of the resolution of the House of Representatives; but I know that I am right when I say that it brings before us what came as printed matter as well as what came as secret evidence. I rose principally for the purpose of saying that I see no ground to call in question the conduct of the House of Representatives, whatever may be thought of the conduct of the committee or any one of its members; because, as I understand, this additional testimony was not read to the House; it was laid before them as secret testimony, and they acted upon the opinion which the committee gave them, that there was in that, taken in connection with the other evidence in the case, matter affecting a Senator; and upon that statement of the committee they sent it here. They could have designed no disrespect to the Senate, I am sure; and it would be therefore wrong, as I think, to dispose of the matter in any other way than that which is perfectly consistent with the respect which we ought to owe, and which we do owe, to a coordinate branch of the Government. I hope, therefore, a reference will be ordered to some committee; the Judiciary Committee, I suppose, is the proper committee.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to ask a question of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin and the honorable Senator from Tennessee, upon whom this evidence seems to reflect; and that is, whether they do or do not desire that the Committee on the Judiciary should be vested with power to send for persons and papers with a view to carry on this investigation?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly I desire that it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that they should have full power to investigate.

Mr. HOWARD. I move, then, that the committee be authorized to send for persons and papers with a view to prosecute the investigation.

Mr. JOHNSON. My friend from Michigan will permit me to suggest what I think is the course in such matters. The committee, after the case is submitted to them, decide for themselves whether they desire to have the authority to subpoena persons and get papers. That was done in the case of the credentials I presented the other day of my colleague, and I think it has always been the rule. If when the committee have examined into this question they come to the conclusion that they require the presence of witnesses and the production of papers, they will no doubt, through their chairman, request authority for that purpose.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand from the Senator from Wisconsin that he is anxious that the committee should be vested with that power.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. Not only in reference to the general inquiry, but especially in reference to his own case.

Mr. JOHNSON. But that ought to depend on the opinion of the committee. They may come to the conclusion that it is not necessary.

Mr. HOWARD. I make the motion that the committee be authorized to send for persons and papers.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. I fully concur in the proposition of the Senator from Michigan. I have no objection to the committee being authorized to send for persons and papers. Indeed I really desire it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that this subject be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with authority to send for persons and papers. The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk:

Mr. President, the House of Representatives has agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution of the House No. 8, directing the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the execution of a law passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny.

It has also passed the following Senate bills: A bill (S. No. 38) in relation to the acknowledgment of deeds in the District of Columbia; and

A bill (S. No. 77) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to reimburse the State of West Virginia for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and paying militia forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion," approved June 21, 1866.

The President of the United States having returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, the bill (H. R. No. 33) entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration," with his objections thereto, the House of Representatives has proceeded, in conformity with the Constitution, to reconsider the said bill and has—

Resolved, That it do pass, two thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

And I am directed to communicate to the Senate the said bill with the objections of the President thereto, and the proceedings of the House of Representatives thereon.

SUPPLEMENTARY RECONSTRUCTION BILL VETO.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill returned by the President with his objections.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The bill (H. R. No. 33) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, is now before the Senate on reconsideration. The message of the President, returning the bill with his objections to the House of Representatives, will be read.

The Secretary read the veto message, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I have considered the bill entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration," and now return it to the House of Representatives, with my objections.

This bill provides for elections in the ten States brought under the operation of the original act to which it is supplementary. Its details are principally directed to the elections for the formation of the State constitutions, but by the sixth section of the bill "all elections" in these States occurring while the original act remains in force are brought within its purview. Referring to the details, it will be found that, first of all, there is to be a registration of the voters. No one whose name has not been admitted on the list is to be allowed to vote at any of these elections. To ascertain who is entitled to registration, reference is made necessary, by the express language of the supplement, to the original act and to the pending bill. The fifth section of the original act provides, as to voters, that they shall be "male citizens of the State; twenty-one years old and upward, of whatever race, color, or previous condition, who have been resident of said State for one year." This is the general qualification, followed, however, by many exceptions. No one can be registered, according to the original act, "who may be disfranchised for participation in the rebellion," a provision which left undetermined the question as to what amounted to disfranchisement, and whether, without a judicial sentence, the act itself produced that effect. This supplemental bill superadds an oath, to be taken by every person before his name can be admitted upon the registration, that he has "not been disfranchised for participation in any rebellion or civil war against the United States." It thus imposes upon every person the necessity and responsibility of deciding for himself, under the peril of punishment by a military commission, if he makes a mistake, what works disfranchisement by participation in rebellion, and what amounts to such participation. Almost every man—the negro as well as the white—above twenty-one years of age, who was resident in these ten States during the rebellion, voluntarily or involuntarily, at some time and in some way did participate in resistance to the lawful authority of the General Government. The question with the citizen to whom this oath is to be proposed must be a fearful one; for while the bill does not declare that perjury may be assigned for such false swearing, nor fix any penalty for the offense, we must not forget that martial law prevails; that every person is answerable to a military commission, without previous presentment by a grand jury for any charge that may be made against him; and that the supreme authority of the military commander determines the question as to what is an offense, and what is to be the measure of punishment.

The fourth section of the bill provides "that the commanding general of each district shall appoint as many boards of registration as may be necessary, consisting of three loyal officers or persons." The only qualification stated for these officers is that they must be "loyal." They may be persons in the military service or civilians, residents of the State or strangers. Yet these persons are to exercise most important duties, and are vested with unlimited discretion. They are to decide what names shall be placed upon the register; and from their decision there is to be no appeal. They are to superintend the elections, and to decide all questions which may arise. They are to have the custody of the ballots, and to make returns of the persons elected. Whatever frauds or errors they may commit must pass without redress. All that is left for the commanding general is to receive the returns of the elections, open the same, and ascertain who are chosen "according to the returns of the officers who conducted said elections." By such means, and with this sort of agency, are the conventions of delegates to be constituted.

As the delegates are to speak for the people, common justice would seem to require that they should have authority from the people themselves. No convention so constituted will in any sense represent the wishes of the inhabitants of these States; for, under the all-embracing exceptions of these laws, by a construction which the uncertainty of the clause as to disfranchisement leaves open to the board of officers, the great body of the people may be excluded from the polls, and from all opportunity of expressing their own wishes, or voting for delegates who will faithfully reflect their sentiments.

I do not deem it necessary further to investigate the details of this bill. No consideration could induce me to give my approval to such an election law for any purpose, and especially for the great purpose of framing the constitution of a State. If ever the American citizen should be left to the free exercise of his own judgment it is when he is engaged in the work of forming the fundamental law under which he is to live. That is his work, and it cannot properly be taken out of his hands. All this legislation proceeds upon the contrary assumption, that the people of each of these States shall have no constitution except such as may be arbitrarily dictated by Congress and formed under the restraint of military rule. A plain statement of facts makes this evident.

In all these States there are existing constitutions formed in the accustomed way by the people. Congress, however, declares that these constitutions are not "loyal and republican," and requires the people to form them anew. What, then, in the opinion of Congress, is necessary to make the constitution of a State "loyal and republican?" The original act answers the question. It is universal negro suffrage, a question which the Federal Constitution leaves to the States themselves. All this legislative machinery of martial law, military coercion, and political disfranchisement is avowedly for that purpose and none other. The existing constitutions of the ten States conform to the acknowledged standards of loyalty and republicanism. Indeed, if there are degrees in republican forms of government, their constitutions are more republican now than when these States—four of which were members of the original thirteen—first became members of the Union.

Congress does not now demand that a single provision of their constitutions be changed, except such as confine suffrage to the white population. It is apparent, therefore, that these provisions do not conform to the standard of republicanism which Congress seeks to establish. That there may be no mistake, it is only necessary that reference should be made to the original act, which declares—

"Such constitution shall provide that the elective franchise shall be enjoyed by all such persons as have the qualifications herein stated for electors of delegates."

What class of persons is here meant clearly appears in the same section. That is to say:

"The male citizens of said State, twenty-one years old and upward, of whatever race, color, or previous condition, who have been resident in said State for one year previous to the day of such election."

Without these provisions no constitution which can be framed in any one of the ten States will be of any avail with Congress. This, then, is the test of what the constitution of a State of this Union must contain to make it republican. Measured by such a standard, how few of the States now composing the Union have republican constitutions! If, in the exercise of the constitutional guarantee that Congress shall secure to every State a republican form of government, universal suffrage for blacks as well as whites is a sine qua non, the work of reconstruction may as well begin in Ohio as in Virginia, in Pennsylvania as in North Carolina.

When I contemplate the millions of our fellow-citizens of the South, with no alternative left but to impose upon themselves this fearful and untried experiment of complete negro enfranchisement and white disfranchisement, it may be almost as complete, or submit indefinitely to the rigor of martial law, without a single attribute of freedmen, deprived of all the sacred guarantees of our Federal Constitution, and threatened with even worse wrongs, if any worse are possible, it seems to me their condition is the most deplorable to which any people can be reduced. It is true that they have been engaged in rebellion, and that, their object being a separation of the States and a dissolution of the Union, there was an obligation resting upon every loyal citizen to treat them as enemies, and to wage war against their cause.

Inflexibly opposed to any movement imperiling the integrity of the Government, I did not hesitate to urge the adoption of all measures necessary for the suppression of the insurrection. After a long and terrible struggle the efforts of the Government were triumphantly successful, and the people of the South, submitting to the stern arbitrament, yielded forever the issues of the contest. Hostilities terminated soon after it became my duty to assume the responsibilities of the Chief Executive officer of the Republic, and I at once endeavored to repress and control the passions which our civil strife had engendered, and no longer regarding these erring millions as enemies again acknowledged them as our friends and our countrymen. The war had accomplished its objects. The nation was saved, and that seminal principal of mischief which, from the birth of the Government, had gradually but inevitably brought on the rebellion, was totally eradicated. Then, it seemed to me, was the auspicious time to commence the work of reconciliation; then, when the people sought once more our friendship and protection, I considered it our duty generously to meet them in the spirit of charity and forgiveness and to conquer them even more effectually by the magnanimity of the nation than by the force of its arms. I yet believe that if the policy of reconciliation then inaugurated, and which contemplated an early restoration of these people to all their political rights, had received the support of Congress, every one of these ten States and all their people would at this moment be fast anchored in the Union, and the great work which gave the war all its sanction and made it just and holy would have been accomplished. Then over all the vast and fruitful regions of the South peace and its blessings would have prevailed, while now millions are deprived of rights guaranteed by the Constitution to every citizen, and after nearly two years of legislation find themselves placed under an absolute military despotism. "A military Republic, a Government formed on mock elections, and supported daily by the sword," was nearly a quarter of a century since pronounced by Daniel Webster, when speaking of the South American States, as a "movement indeed, but a retrograde and disastrous movement, from the regular and old-fashioned monarchical systems;" and he added:

"If men would enjoy the blessings of republican government they must govern themselves by reason, by mutual counsel and consultation, by a sense and feeling of general interest, and by the acquiescence of the minority in the will of the majority, properly expressed; and, above all, the military must be kept, according to the language of our bill of rights, in strict subordination to the civil authority. Where ever this lesson is not both learned and practiced there can be no political freedom. Absurd, preposterous is it, a scoff and a satire on free forms of constitutional liberty for forms of government to be prescribed by military leaders, and the right of suffrage to be exercised at the point of the sword."

I confidently believe that a time will come when these States will again occupy their true positions in the Union. The barriers which now seem so obstinate must yield to the force of an enlightened and just public opinion, and sooner or later unconstitutional and oppressive legislation will be effaced from our statute-books. When this shall have been consummated I pray God that the errors of the past may be forgotten, and that once more we shall be a happy, united, and prosperous people, and that at last, after the bitter and eventful experience through which the nation has passed, we shall all come to know that our only safety is in the preservation of our Federal Constitution, and in according to every American citizen and to every State the rights which that Constitution secures.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, March 23, 1867.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall this bill pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding? The vote will be taken by yeas and nays in order to ascertain whether the bill receives a constitutional majority.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 40, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—40.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, and Saulsbury—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, and Riddle—6.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two thirds of the Senate having voted for the bill, it is passed, and two thirds of the House of Representatives having previously repassed the bill, it is now a law, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to call up Senate bill No. 106, with a view of getting a vote and making a remark or two upon the subject.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the Senator from Rhode Island proceeds I wish to offer a resolution.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I give way for that purpose.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses on Tuesday next, March 26, at twelve o'clock meridian, until the first Monday of December, 1867, at twelve o'clock meridian.

Mr. DRAKE. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "the first Monday of December," and inserting "Tuesday, the 15th day of October."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is, whether the Senate will consider the resolution at this time. Does the Senator from Illinois ask for its present consideration?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution is before the Senate. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DRAKE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 19, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cole, Drake, Edmunds, Fowler, Harlan, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, and Riddle—6.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to amend the resolution by inserting in lieu of "the first Monday of December" the "first Monday of November."

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the time when nearly all the State elections are held, and it will be very difficult to get a quorum here. Every member, I suppose, would like to be in his own State when the election is taking place. I think they pretty much all take place in November.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us have the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont what recommendation, in his estimation, this proposition has? I ask him whether it does not involve all the inconveniences of the proposition we have just voted down, without any corresponding benefits? It would bring us here one month, or about one month, earlier than usual. In the State of New York the most important election in many respects we have had for years is to occur on a day later than that which the Senator proposes, an election at which we are to vote upon the ratification of a new constitution; at which we are to elect a new Senate and a new Legislature throughout, and nearly all the State officers. In addition to that, it is the harvest of almost every seed time—I speak of commercial business and all sorts of business. No matter what a man may do, according to the usages of our community, just about the time the Senator proposes is the important time for him in casting up the accounts of the whole year. The courts are in session then, and every sort of business is in that situation that no more inconvenient time to leave home could be found in the calendar than the first Monday of November.

Mr. President, as I am up I want to say one other word about this matter. The first Monday of December occurs about the same time of year now that it did fifty or sixty years ago; and the men who fixed that day at that time for the meeting of Congress considered carefully, and I think experience has shown wisely, the time which they fixed. If there is anything extraordinary in this year which we are called upon to accept and to admit that we are called upon to do extraordinary things, so be it; but for one I do not believe it. I believe that there is power, that there is good result in adjourning, as we generally adjourn, to the ordinary time, to the end that the country, the commercial, the business, and the political community may have some repose. An extraordinary session at any time brings up before all classes of men that kind of legislation which they may dread. If a man is afraid of a tariff he surmises that that is the occasion for the session. If he is afraid that the national banks or the currency may be disturbed he imagines that that is the occasion. Now, I should like to have an arrangement which will leave, as far as we can leave, repose to the country, and not have a condition of things putting men into a fever, and making every other man afraid to buy anything in the spring for fear he cannot sell it for as much in the fall, owing to something that may take place in the way of legislation in the mean time. I hope we shall adjourn until the ordinary time, unless some provision is wanted by which, in case of an extraordinary emergency, we can come together for that and for nothing else. For one, I anticipate no extraordinary emergency; I do not see how any can arise; and I am entirely ready to vote for the ordinary adjournment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That is an extraordinarily long question to answer. [Laughter.] I perceive that the Senator from New York has not asked the question so much to receive information as to give information to the Senate on the negative side of the question. I am very glad, Mr. President, to think and believe that Senators will see that the amendment proposed by me needs no argument and no illustration. I supposed it was perfectly obvious upon the face of it. The reason for it is that we shall thereby have one month of labor in November instead of in June or July. I think it would be well that we should make a permanent law on the subject, and have our sessions always commence on the first Monday of November.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there any reason for it this year more than any other?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not make the proposition in view of any special reason for it this year, but for general reasons. I hope it will be adopted.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cole, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Harlan, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Norton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Doolittle, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, and Riddle—8.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "that" immediately following the resolving clause and inserting:

The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, on Thursday the 28th day of March, at twelve o'clock meridian, adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday of June, and that on that day unless it be then otherwise ordered by the two Houses, they further adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday of December, 1867.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Drake,

Fowler, Harlan, Howe, Morton, Pomeroy, Ross, Sumner, Trayer, Wilson, and Yates—14.
 NAYS—Messrs. Beckwith, Cattell, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelighausen, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Newton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Williams—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Conkling, Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Riddle, and Wade—8.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN and others. Oh, no! let us dispose of this resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope this question will not be disposed of now. I do not think we are in a situation at this time to decide when we shall adjourn. To adjourn now until the first Monday of December, is to declare to the country that we have full faith in the Executive and in the present management of affairs. I do not believe the country has that faith even if the Congress of the United States has. Certainly one half of the offices in my State are unfilled, internal revenue offices, post offices, and custom-houses; and so it is in other States. We are paid to remain here by the year to attend to the public business, and I do not believe the country expects us to leave our posts when there is danger to the finances or to any other department of the Government. I insist on my motion that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORTON. I am in favor of now proceeding to the consideration of executive business simply for the purpose of allowing us an opportunity for the further consideration of this question. It was asked a few minutes ago by the Senator from New York what reason there was for meeting earlier this year than the ordinary period. Let me ask what reason there was for providing for this session of Congress at all? The last session thought there was reason for it; the country thought there was reason for it. I was opposed to the proposition made by the House of Representatives a few days ago to adjourn until the first Monday in May; but I am equally opposed to adjourning over until the first Monday in December. The times are extraordinary. We have never had such a condition of things before, and I hope we shall never have again. We are trying a new system on ten States; we have provided for their military government; we have adopted a system of reconstruction which we hope and believe will work well; but if there ever was a time when Congress should come together at an early period for the purpose of supervising the condition of the country that time is now.

My experience here is very brief; but I have always heard it said that there was scarcely anything done between the first Monday of December and the meeting after the Christmas holidays; the time being short, but little is expected to be done during that period, and but little is done. I should very much prefer meeting about the middle of October and getting through earlier the next spring. There may be a condition of things in the southern States that would imperiously require the presence of Congress before the first Monday of December, and I agree entirely with the Senator from Michigan that the people do not expect this Congress to adjourn over until December. The times are critical; the condition of the country is entirely anomalous; it is not an ordinary season, in which we can afford to take our repose at home, as suggested by the Senator from New York. I am therefore opposed to adjourning over until the first Monday in December; and for the purpose of getting time for the further consideration of this question I hope we shall go into executive session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope we shall dispose of this matter now. What time is wanted for further consideration? We have been considering it ever since the session commenced. In one way and another it has been under consideration all the time, and it has been generally understood I believe that when the bill which has been passed over the President's veto to-day should be finally disposed of, we could then fix the day of adjournment, for there would be nothing left on which it was particularly necessary for us to act. As to the remark of the Senator from Michigan, that the executive business is not disposed of, let me say that that is of no manner of consequence with regard to this resolution, because if the executive business is not disposed of by the time indicated for the adjournment the President can call the Senate together, and will be very likely to do so by proclamation as soon as the time of adjournment is fixed, and the Senate will then meet in order to dispose of that business; but it is unnecessary to keep the House of Representatives here for that purpose. That argument, therefore, does not seem to apply.

Now, Mr. President, I see no necessity for our fixing a day for the meeting of Congress other than the ordinary day on which we meet in the winter. If I believed the majority would have sustained my opinion, I would have agreed to the proposition of the Senator from Vermont, to meet on the first Monday in November, not for any reason applicable to the condition of the country, but simply for the purpose of gaining time at the beginning of the session, rather than protracting our session late into the next year; but I was satisfied that that proposition would not carry in either branch, and therefore I did not vote for it.

I must say, sir, that I do not believe the people have any expectation about this question. I know it is the fashion for gentlemen to talk about what the people expect. I should like to know what authority they have to speak for the people upon this subject. I do not undertake to speak for the people of Maine; I believe that they are willing to leave a question of this kind to the discretion of myself and my colleague here, and of the Representatives of Maine in the other House. They are apt to think that we are the better judges of such a subject, having the matter all before us, and are not disposed, generally to complain of the action which we think it wise to adopt. I have heard this argument about what the people expect of us a great many times, and it has just exactly this effect upon my mind: if I am satisfied that that feeling exists, and that it is a just and proper one, and ought to be followed, I am disposed of course to follow it; but I see no evidence of any opinion expressed on the part of the masses of the community on this subject.

We have been in session for a very considerable period since the regular adjournment. We have transacted our business. What particular matter is there to call us together in the intermediate time between this and the winter? The Senator from Michigan himself voted in favor of meeting in October. If any mischief can be done, that mischief can be done just as well between this time and October as it can between this time and December. We have accomplished all that gentlemen wished to have accomplished. The President's hands are tied with reference to appointments; we have passed a bill which provides for that; and in reference to the condition of affairs in the South, we have provided for the protection of our fellow-citizens there, and for the institution of republican governments there, upon which the people of those States cannot act conclusively before we shall meet in December, the usual time. I see nothing in the world that apparently calls upon us to fix an earlier day. If anything should occur in the political world or in connection with other peoples that would require that we should be called together, I have no doubt the President would call us together; but nothing except something totally unlooked for that we cannot now anticipate seems in my judgment to call upon us to fix a different day from the usual one. I think it would be more dignified, more consistent with the perfect idea of the satisfaction of Congress that it has done its duty and provided for the protection of the people from now until the usual time when we meet again, to meet at the usual time or somewhere near it, even taking it for granted that any injury can be done to us or the people of the country between now and that period. I hope, therefore, as this question is up, and I have no doubt every Senator has made up his mind upon it, we shall proceed to settle it one way or the other, and not have it hanging here by the eyelids to be talked about any longer.

Mr. STEWART. I rise simply to suggest to the Senator from Indiana that in my opinion, so far as reconstruction is concerned, the best thing we can do is to go away until December. While we are here resolutions and propositions will be constantly presented on that subject, keeping everything in uncertainty, and the southern people, expecting that we will do something else, will be waiting for that. What we have done satisfies me, and I believe satisfies the country; and I think it would be better for all parties for us now to wait and see if it satisfies the southern people. Let them discuss it among themselves without regard to any change that may be made by Congress. I think, so far as reconstruction is concerned, the sooner we leave here the better, and it is proper we should stay away the usual length of time. So far as that matter is concerned I think it highly important, if what we have done is satisfactory, as I believe it is, that the southern people should have time to reflect upon it. They can do no harm. If when we return we find that anything has been done wrong, if anybody shall have failed to do his duty, the matter can be dealt with by Congress. Sitting here continuously, or coming here at an unusual time and agitating this question, will, I fear, place us in a false position and make our work less effective than it otherwise would be. I believe the proper thing to be done now is to adjourn until the usual time for the meeting of Congress, and I hope that motion will prevail. If we meet in November or at an earlier day it will inconvenience several States, especially those on the Pacific. California has a very important election in October.

Mr. COLE. In September.

Mr. STEWART. I should have said September; and her members might possibly be here by November, but it would be hurrying them too much. There are many State elections in November, and if that is the time for the meeting of Congress it disarranges the arrangements of many gentlemen. I think if we meet in November nothing will be gained, because nothing will be done anyhow before the holidays, and it will only interfere with the arrangements of gentlemen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 14, noes 31.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to record my vote against the resolution. I do not believe the country expects us to desert our posts at this time. I ask for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DRAKE. Without wishing to protract the debate on this subject I would say a word. I would like to know from these gentlemen who were members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress that passed the law requiring this session to be held, what the object of it was? If we are to come here and sit two or three weeks and then leave our posts until next December, I do not understand why that thing should have been done.

Mr. RAMSEY. It was done to get an organization.

Mr. DRAKE. I understood, and the people in the region of country from which I come understood, that the exigencies of the country demand that Congress should keep itself in a position to put its hand on the affairs of the country at any moment; that it was not regarded that the affairs of the country were safe in the hands of the Administration, and that this session of Congress was called so that Congress might be in a position to take part in the affairs of the country at any critical moment which might arise. And now the proposition is to adjourn over till next December. I presume that it may be a matter of indifference to some Senators on this floor what their people think about this matter. It is not a matter of indifference to me what the people whom I represent in part here think about it. I say, sir, that in the great region in which I reside, in the valley of the Mississippi, the universal belief was that this session of Congress was provided for the purpose I have named; and that we should now turn round and abandon that purpose, leaving everything in the hands of an Administration in whom the great mass of the people have not confidence seems to me to be disappointing the just expectations of the people.

Mr. YATES. I concur in what the Senator from Missouri has said on this subject. The object of the present session of Congress, if I understood it, was to enable Congress to control the affairs of the country. Now, sir, can we adjourn with the assurance that all things will go forward smoothly to the best interests of the country? In whose hands are we leaving the interests of the country? In the hands of an executive officer who, upon this very day when we propose to adjourn, huris in our faces his defiance, and vetoes the action of the two Houses of Congress. Sir, the legislation which we have adopted depends for its enforcement upon the action of the President of the United States. Have we any guarantee that he will enforce that legislation properly? Does his past conduct justify us in the belief that he will enforce the legislation of Congress faithfully? Is there any evidence that he desires to carry out the legislation of Congress? The last Congress and this Congress have passed measures which, if properly carried out, would endear them to the people of the country. Correct principles have triumphed. The policy of universal suffrage has triumphed; it now only remains to carry out that policy. It is only one year ago since it was proposed in the first instance, and now it has triumphed. But, sir, how is the policy of universal suffrage to be carried out in the South when it depends for its enforcement and execution upon those who are opposed to it? Is the President friendly to this policy? Has he not the appointment of the officers who are to execute this policy, and who are to carry it out? And shall the representatives of the American people rely upon the enemies of the policy which they have adopted for its faithful execution?

I do not agree with the Senator from Maine. I do not believe that the President of the United States will, under any circumstances whatever, call this Congress together. I do not like to oppose my opinion to his; but, sir, I feel a consciousness that never, under any circumstances, will the President of the United States call this Congress together again. Why call it together when he vetoes every measure that it passes? Why call it together when he does not agree with this Congress in any particular whatever?

The Senator from Maine may say that he cares not what the people expect on this subject. Sir—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have said no such thing.

Mr. YATES. The Senator from Maine has stated that he does not suppose the people are as anxious on this subject as gentlemen pretend.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will allow me, I was speaking of what was stated here. I stated that I had no evidence upon that subject at all, and that when Senators chose to say it I was not convinced that that was the fact. That was the idea.

Mr. YATES. I do not wish to misrepresent the honorable Senator; but I do wish to say that due deference to a public opinion which we ourselves have created is to be expected. This opinion we have manufactured, or we have participated in its manufacture. We have charged the President of the United States with being guilty of the usurpation of powers which belong to the Congress of the United States. We know that he is opposed to every measure of any important character which has been inaugurated and adopted by the present Congress of the United States. And now, sir, after this session has been created for the purpose of carrying out the measures of Congress, and when the execution of those measures depends upon the action of the President himself, we propose to go home and leave the execution of those laws in his hands. He is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States. He appoints the military officers to execute our laws. He may, if he chooses, appoint Sheridan and Schofield and other loyal men now and remove them to-morrow. He is not in favor of the doctrines for which we have contended. He contends that these States are in the Union now, that they are entitled to representation now, and by his numerous vetoes, by his persistent policy, he has all the time maintained that position. And now when we yield, when we surrender all into his hands, when we retire from our posts of duty and leave to him the execution of these laws, are we to suppose that he will do it faithfully and honestly?

Sir, I know that the people expect that we will stand by our posts, especially at this particular crisis. I believe it is the duty of this Congress never to surrender the position which they have assumed while there is an enemy in the country who stands in the way of the Government and of the faithful carrying out of the measures which have been inaugurated. Whoever that man be, whether he be the President of the United States or any other person, who stands in the path of this country for union, to honor, and to glory, should be taken out of the way. I am not saying how. Of course I mean by constitutional and proper means. I am not saying that the President shall be impeached; but I am saying that while it is in our power to carry out the policy which we have inaugurated, to secure suffrage to all the people of the South, to organize the Government and the States lately in rebellion upon the principles of republicanism, by simply adjourning over to a shorter period than usual; if we do not do it, and if our policy of reconstruction shall thereby fail, then, sir, the responsibility will be on us. It will be a fearful responsibility. We shall be responsible for all the blood that has been shed in this war and for all the money that has been expended.

Sir, I should like to go home; I should like to leave this scene of discord as much as the honorable Senator from Maine or any other Senator upon this floor; but my duty demands that I shall stay here or make provision that I can come here, if needed, until I know that the legislation which has been adopted by this Congress has been carried out; that what we have done has not been done in vain; that we are not holding out to the country some delusive hope that we have settled the difficulties by which the country is embarrassed, and retire to our homes. In my opinion it would be an act of moral and political cowardice to desert the ship of state when the storms have not yet disappeared.

I am therefore opposed to this adjournment. I will not say, as some have said, for I will not put arguments into the mouths of our political opponents, that to adjourn under present circumstances would be an acquiescence in the assertion that the charges we have made against the President have no foundation in fact. I will not say so, because I know it is not the intention of honorable Senators to make that admission by this adjournment: but, sir, from one end of this country to the other every Democratic paper will cry out, "Your charges were false: they were groundless: you have admitted it by your adjournment: you have intrusted the execution of your laws into the hands of him whom you have declared to be an enemy of your policy and who himself has signified his opposition by vetoing almost every important measure which you yourselves have adopted."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to ask my honorable friend from Illinois, before he takes his seat, against the action of what department of the Government it is that he wishes to preserve the interests and the honor of his country; and I know that I cannot propound that question to a gentleman of more enlarged heart and noble patriotism than the honorable Senator from Illinois. Who is this enemy that, like the serpent amid the trees of Eden, is winding himself through our Paradise? Who is it, I ask the Senator, that has unpatriotic motives, unpatriotic intentions against the liberty, the freedom, or the happiness of his country? Why is this invocation made to the legislative department of the country to keep in perpetual session that no detriment shall come to the public? My honorable friend has indicated. It seems that at the other end of the avenue there is an occupant of a house whose patriotic intentions he questions. I ask him to state authoritatively to the American people whether he means to charge upon the Executive of the United States either a desire or a design, through the recess of Congress, to do aught that would not conduce to the glory, the honor, and the greatness of his and our common country?

I do not wish to enter into a discussion of this question at this late hour, but if forced to the rencontre, having served in this body with that distinguished gentleman before he was President, never having received any favor from him nor for any friend of mine since he has been President to the best of my knowledge, I shall not be wanting in a vindication of his character, which, whatever I may think of his political principles or political action, I have always admired as noble and patriotic.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Illinois invoke us not to desert our posts. For my part I have no intention of deserting. The invocation led me to inquire of myself what our post is. I supposed it to be the post of legislation, nothing more nor less. If there were legislation yet required for the honor or the peace or the welfare of the country, the appeal to us not to desert or not to go home would be timely; but no Senator suggests anything of the kind.

I have voted for each of the amendments which have been moved here; but each of those amendments had reference, not to the time when we shall adjourn, but to the time to which we shall adjourn. All are agreed that we have nothing more to do now in the way of legislation. All agree that we can safely leave here next week. That is admitted. But some Senators imagine that we ought to come back in November; some that we ought to come back in October; some that there may be a possibility of our being wanted here in June. There may be that possibility, there is that possibility, that we may be needed here in June; and I voted for the amendment which would provide for our coming back here in June if that contingency should arise. I voted for the amendment which proposed to bring us back here in October, and for the other which proposed to bring us back in November.

But I concur with all the rest of the Senate in the belief that there is nothing for us to do now as a Legislature. The legislation of the session is done. Why not leave here? It is not seriously proposed, is it, that, having done up the work of legislation for the country, the Congress of the United States is now to undertake to run the executive department of the Government, is to resolve itself into a sort of picket guard upon the President, act as aid-camps for the Commander-in-Chief? You have declared what laws you want enforced.

The Senator from Illinois says that if we leave it to the President to execute those laws we concede that all our charges have been groundless. Why, sir, in the name of the Constitution, to whom should we leave it? To whom is it left to execute these laws if not to the President? How can we aid him, how can we hinder him, how can we guide him in that which the Constitution leaves expressly to him? All we know about it is that the individual to execute these laws is fixed and determined for the present. He will execute them, or he will not; one of the two. He will discharge his duty, or he will fail to discharge it. I do not know, it is not given to me to foreknow which he will do; but if he discharges his duty he will satisfy me as a citizen, as a lover of my country. If he fails to discharge his duty, he will do my political friends more service than they will do themselves by staying here. So I think, with all the rest of the Senate, that we had better adjourn on Tuesday next, because our legislation is completed. I would be glad to come back earlier than the time suggested; but I think the country will survive until December if we do not come back.

Mr. NYE. I wish to submit to the Senate one or two considerations why I think Congress should not adjourn at this particular period. I know the inconvenience to which it will put a number of individuals, and I deeply sympathize and share with them in their desire to go home.

The news of the passage of the law calling Congress together on the 4th day of March I received while on the Pacific coast. I know that there, by the lovers of their country, the passage of that law was hailed with great joy. The understanding of the object of the passage of that law was that Congress was to remain at least in a position where they would be able to do all that they could do in saving the country at this critical moment. I have been told since I came here that the only object of calling this session of Congress at that unusual time was to organize the two Houses of Congress. I know that was not the object the people thought it was called for, simply to organize the two Houses of Congress. They thought, and think still, that the exigencies of the country required that Congress should be in a position to assemble at least speedily in view of any emergency that may occur.

One more suggestion, sir. We all know that there are now strong efforts being made—and I doubt not they will succeed—to test the constitutionality of the reconstruction bill. The President declares in his message to-day that the measure is unconstitutional. He declares that the oath contained in that bill, submitted by my friend from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] is unconstitutional. Suppose that upon the assembling of the Supreme Court of the United States next month that court should hold upon some issue made up that that portion or any portion or all of that bill was unconstitutional, what then, sir? The bill of course fails; reconstruction stops, for there is no law under which these States can be reconstructed. Congress has asserted the fact, in which I fully believe, that it is its duty to prescribe the rules and the law of reconstruction. Suppose that next month the court declare that this law is unconstitutional, does any Senator in this body say that the people would not require Congress to assemble at once and pass another reconstruction act that was constitutional? But, sir, it would retard, it would stop the whole machinery of reconstruction, which every one in this body seems so anxious should roll along.

In view of these considerations I submit, with due deference to the assertion of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, that the legislation of this body is not done till this great reconstruction measure is perfected and carried out. I have not the confidence the distinguished Senator from Maine has, that the President would call us together if any emergency should arise. On the other hand, I think if he had the power he would prorogue us. He would do what the distinguished Senator from Illinois did on one occasion with the Legislature of that State: he would send us home, and he would never call one of us back. For that I do not blame him. He will not convene Congress. It is to my mind clear that an emergency is quite likely to arise in which Congress should convene. I hope Senators, with all their anxiety to go home, will have an eye to their higher and greater duty of carrying out the great work of reconstruction which they have so nobly begun.

Mr. CONNESS. We have been asked several times in connection with this question of adjournment, why this Congress was called together. It appears to me that there has been a sufficient answer in the work done since the convening of the new Congress. If any other answer need be given it might be found in the desire that some of us had who had been here a long time, and to whom legislation is not new, but rather tiresome, to give the junior members of the body, our respected and valued associates, a chance to get into harness. We have given them that, I think; and they have no right to complain. I know they have not availed themselves of the opportunity that we have generously given them to any great extent. That, however, cannot affect my honorable friend from Nevada. That cannot be the difficulty in his case, because he has been here a good while. It is true the condition of my friend's health for a considerable period at the beginning of the late session, and indeed until nearly its close, prevented his attendance; and it may be that on that account he feels so refreshed as to give him an equal desire with our new and respected associates to enter upon the great business of running this institution, which my friend from Illinois describes as the ship of state. It appears to me, Mr. President, that the ship of state had better be let alone for awhile; that as wise merchants, if we feel an ownership in the ship and an interest in her, we had better take care, after having made profitable voyages, how we enter upon others, particularly how we enter upon a period when there are no markets for our commodities; when the people with whom we have to deal are rather afraid that we will enter their harbors and disturb their transactions.

I am inclined to think that the Senate is right in the great vote it has given in favor of adjourning this Congress after we have done our work well and truly, and I may say completely, and so far as I can judge, to the country's satisfaction. We had better confirm that decision and prepare to go hence. We shall have abundant time hereafter.

As to these allusions made to the President, and the inference deduced from the declarations found in the message that has been read to us to-day, as to his disposition or indisposition to execute the laws, I have no fear on that point. I have no fear that the President will not execute the laws we have passed, and certainly I would not tell the country now that I had such a fear. We have been—I was going to make an observation that I shall not make—we have been told by some, that the President should be impeached and turned out of office. If there be any persons in the land who desire that that should be done, or who think it ought to be done, it appears to me that they particularly would be glad to give the President an opportunity to fail to execute the laws. Laws of a very distinctive character have been passed not meeting his approbation, but condemned by him. Let the Executive run the ship of state for awhile, his part of it. Let us not undertake to be in the fore-castle and in the cabin at the same time. The whole craft does not belong to us. It is true that we have a big interest in her, so big that we have felt it our duty, and shall always I trust feel it our duty, to prevent anybody from wrecking her; but that interest, great as it is, does not authorize us to seize her and make her the sport of our will entirely and completely.

Mr. President, there are two sides to all these questions, and having done our duty in our sphere, and as I believe done it well, let us cease for awhile that others may enter upon the performance of theirs. The honorable Senator from Maine when he was up did not intimate, I think, that the President would convene us as a Congress for legislative business; but in reply to the suggestion that there was executive business to be done which had not been attended to, he said the President would reconvene the Senate, as he will undoubtedly by proclamation when we shall have only executive business to do; but I think it is time Congress in its legislative capacity should cease and determine.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. FOWLER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to make a single remark as to the argument derived from the fact that a law was passed providing for this session. I did not particularly favor that law; but I acquiesced in its adoption, for the reason that at that time there was no plan of reconstruction even proposed, and it was not then known whether at the last session of Congress any plan would be suggested or consummated. It so happened that subsequent to that time a plan was brought forward which has been adopted, a complete and perfect plan of reconstruction. The doors of the Union are open to the southern people, and they can walk in whenever they please to comply with our terms. This session, as I understand it, was provided for so that in case no legislation should be had at the last session such as the exigency demanded there would be a session in which we might prosecute the necessary legislation. But, sir, I do not understand that the Fortieth Congress was convened on the 4th of March for the purpose of watching the Executive or of transacting executive business, and I have not yet been able to see in what respect our presence here will control the President of the United States. He will be as much at liberty to execute the law or fail to execute the law if we remain in session as if we adjourn; and we know from experience that the President will do as he sees proper whether Congress is or is not in session. I remember last summer when it was proposed to adjourn that many members of Congress expressed great apprehension that there was grave danger in our adjournment, and many argued that it was necessary that we should protract the session throughout the summer, because if we left here we should be leaving everything in the hands of the President. But, sir, the wisest thing the Thirty-Ninth Congress ever did was to adjourn when it did, and let the President take his own course. The consequence was that he "swung round the circle," and in that way, in my humble opinion, he saved this country, or to a very great extent helped to save the country to the Union party. If we had remained here in session the President would necessarily have remained. The fact that no evil followed our adjournment then, notwithstanding the predictions which were made that it would be dangerous, satisfies me now that after we have completed this plan of reconstruction, after the President has appointed the commanders to carry it out, who are entirely satisfactory to the Union men of the country, there is no particular danger in our adjourning at this time, and no particular benefit will follow if we remain; and so far as I understand the wishes of the people, I think they desire some little repose. There has been a constant agitation ever since Congress assembled, political, commercial, financial agitation. Now let us adjourn, and let things settle down. Let us ascertain how this experiment which we are about to try will operate. If satisfactorily, all will be well; if not, we have a remedy when we meet again.

Mr. DRAKE. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Oregon whether he has any information that if we adjourn now the President will "swing round the circle" again? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no other guide by which to judge but experience.

Mr. FOWLER. I submitted a motion to adjourn because I did not wish to hear this protracted debate. I have been ready to vote for a long time; but I proposed an adjournment so that if the Senate deem it necessary to discuss this question we may have a full opportunity to do so on Monday. I shall not, however, persist in the motion.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Maine not only stated that the President would call a session of the Senate to attend to executive business, but he stated that if there was a necessity for action on legislative business the President would call a session of Congress for that purpose, as I understood him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state what I said, or at any rate what I meant to say, and what I think I did say. I spoke of the executive business of the Senate, and I said that the President would undoubtedly, in case of necessity, immediately convoke the Senate to attend to that business. Then I said that there was nothing in the present condition of the country to satisfy me that there would be any necessity for a legislative session before the regular time for the meeting of Congress; that it could only be necessary in the case of some unforeseen emergency which would render it necessary; and that I had no doubt in case such an emergency should arise the President would convene Congress. I repeat it, I have no doubt of it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Precisely. That was as I understood the Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And I illustrated that particularly by speaking in regard to our foreign relations, in which a contingency might arise which is now unforeseen.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the President in good faith carries out these laws that he has himself over and over and over again declared to be unconstitutional, no man here or out of this body supposes that there will be a necessity for an extra session. If that necessity arises, it will be because the President fails to execute the laws which in every veto message he has sent to us he has declared to be unconstitutional.

A few weeks ago I offered a resolution in this body instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire whether the President had any right, under the Constitution or under the laws, to appoint provisional governors of the rebel States. The Senate did not desire that investigation to be made at that time; but since then both Houses of Congress have declared by a majority of more than three to one that he had no power, no right under the Constitution or under the laws, to appoint a provisional governor. If the President of the United States had intended or had desired to call Congress together on any emergency, would he not have called them together when he desired to appoint provisional governors? Would he not then have invited Congress to come in and aid him in the great work of reconstruction?

Mr. President, it is an insult to this body to even intimate that the President would call an extra session of Congress to right a wrong that he himself has committed. It is because he does not execute laws which he has declared unconstitutional that that emergency will have arisen. By leaving our posts at this time we declare to the country that we have confidence in Andrew Johnson, the acting President of the United States. The people of the nation have declared by an overwhelming majority that they have not confidence in Andrew Johnson, acting President of the United States. Now, either this Congress is in the wrong or Andrew Johnson is in the wrong; either this Congress is criminal or Andrew Johnson is criminal; for we stand antipodal in our positions before the nation. The country to-day believes that Congress is in the right and that the President is in the wrong. Let us leave our posts, place the entire Government in the hands of Andrew Johnson for eight or nine months, and what inference will be drawn by the people of the land? That we have confidence in the man whom they have declared that they have no confidence whatever in.

Sir, I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but there are other reasons why we should remain. I believe that the Treasury of the United States was never in so much danger as it is to-day. A set of men have been placed in the management of even the minor offices under the Treasury Department who not only have not the confidence of the communities in which they live, but who have violated every principle of right and justice. The Treasury, in my judgment, has suffered more than fifty million dollars within the last twelve months from the incompetency and criminality of the men who have been placed in office by the present Secretary of the Treasury. Sir, he has placed men all along our northern frontier to protect our customs who have permitted smuggling to go on to an extent that was never seen before. He has placed men to assess and collect our internal revenue who could not be trusted at home or anywhere else. Sir, I thank God that we are not responsible for the present management of the Treasury; but the country will not hold us guiltless if knowing these facts we leave our posts and leave this vast machine of the Treasury in the hands of incompetent or improper men.

As I said before, I do not wish to prolong this discussion; but I wish to record my vote against the proposition to adjourn the present Congress at this time.

Mr. SUMNER. I am against the resolution. In my opinion Congress ought not to adjourn and go home without at least some provision for a return to our post. As often as I think of this question, I am met by two controlling "facts." I speak now of facts which stare us in the face.

You must not forget that our President is a bad man. This is the first "fact." He is a bad man, who is the author of incalculable woe to his country, and especially to that part which has been most tried by war and most needed kindly care. Search history and I am sure that you will find no ruler, who during the same short space of time has done so much mischief to his country. He stands alone in bad eminence. Nobody in ancient or modern times can be his parallel. Alone in the evil he has done, he is also alone in the maudlin and frantic manner which he has adopted. Look at his acts and read his speeches. This is enough.

Such is the fact. And now I ask can Congress quietly vote to go home and leave this bad man without hinderance of any kind? These scenes are historic. His conduct is historic. Permit me to remind you that your course with regard to him will be historic. It can never be forgotten if you keep your seats and meet the usurper face to face; it can never be forgotten if, leaving your seats, you let him remain master to do as he pleases. Most of all, he covets your absence. Do not indulge him.

Then comes the other "fact," which is this: there is at this moment a numerous population—counted by millions; call it, if you please, eight millions—which looks to Congress for protection. Of this large population, all the loyal people stretch out their hands to Congress. They ask you to stay. They know by instinct that so long as you remain in your seats they are not without protection. They have suffered already through the President, who when they needed bread has given them a stone, and when they needed tranquil peace has given them strife. They have seen him offer encouragement to rebels, and even set the rebellion on its legs. Their souls have been wrung as they saw fellow-citizens brutally sacrificed, where their only crime was that they loved the Union; sometimes the sacrifice was on a small scale, and sometimes by wholesale. Witness Memphis; witness New Orleans. Ay, sir, witness the whole broad country from the Potomac to the Rio Grande.

In presence of these two "facts;" with a usurping President menacing the Republic, and with a large population, counted by millions, looking to Congress for protection, I dare not vote to go home. It is my duty to stay here. I am sure that our presence here will be an encouragement and a comfort to loyal people throughout these troubled States. They will feel that they are not left alone with their deadly enemy. Home is always tempting. It is pleasant to escape from care. But duty is more than home or any escape from care. As often as I think of these temptations, I feel their insignificance by the side of solemn obligations. There is the President; he must be watched and opposed. There is an oppressed people; it must be protected. But this cannot be done without effort on the part of Congress. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." Never was there more occasion for this vigilance than now.

An admirable and most suggestive engraving has been placed on our tables to-day, in Harper's Weekly, where President Johnson is represented as a Roman emperor presiding in the amphitheater with imperatorial pomp, and surrounded by his trusty counselors, among whom it is easy to distinguish the Secretary of State and Secretary of the Navy, all of whom look with complacency at the butchery below. The victims are black, and their sacrifice, as gladiators, makes a "Roman holiday." Beneath this picture is written "Amphitheatrum Johnsonianum, Massacre of the Innocents at New Orleans, July, 1866." This inscription tells the terrible story. The bloody scene is before you. The massacre proceeds under the patronage of the President. His presidential rod is the law. At his will blood spirts and men bite the dust. But this is only a single scene in one place. Wherever in the rebel States there is a truly loyal citizen, who loves the Union, there is a victim who may be called to suffer at any moment from that hard-hearted malignant spirit which now rules. I speak according to the evidence. This whole country is an Amphitheatrum Johnsonianum, where the victims are counted by thousands. To my mind there is no duty more urgent than to guard against this bad man and be ready to throw the shield of Congress over the loyal citizens whom he delivers to sacrifice.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know, Mr. President, upon what authority the honorable member from Massachusetts asserts so positively that by adjourning we are to leave unprotected eight million people, and leave them subject to a man who has been over them a despot. I know not by what authority he states that that man, and to adopt the phraseology he has thought proper to adopt, is a bad man and is determined not to discharge his duty. As far as the first charge is concerned I deny it to be a fact that he has failed to protect eight million or any greater or lesser number of people to the whole extent of his power of protection. We have, however, by legislation made it his duty to see to the execution of the laws which we have now passed by which we have extended over them an unmixed military power. As Commander-in-Chief he is under an obligation to see that these laws are executed. The officers in whose hands he has placed the execution of them are men who have tested their loyalty to the Union on many and many a battle-field, and would rather die a thousand times than abandon a duty which involved that loyalty now. The General-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, holding in one respect a command subordinate to that of the President of the United States, stands firmly sealed in the hearts and confidence of the people; and it is not for a moment to be supposed that he would fail to perform to the utmost the whole of the duty which Congress has cast upon him.

I do not know by what authority the honorable member from Michigan has ventured to assert that the President of the United States will not execute these laws on the ground that he has failed to approve of them in consequence of his believing that they are unconstitutional. I suppose I am at liberty to refer to conversations which it has been my privilege to hold with that distinguished functionary, and to state that when I, in a spirit of friendship, and as I hope, of patriotism, suggested to him that he should state in the message, which I understood he proposed to send in assigning his reasons why he was unable to approve the laws in question, that they would be equally valid if they were afterward passed by the required constitutional majority as if they should receive his approval, his answer was, "I have done that in every instance; the Constitution provides that a law shall be as valid without as with presidential approval, provided the Congress of the United States afterward pass it by the required majority; and he was unwilling to make that particular instance an exception to what had been his rule before, because, as he said, he almost considered it an insult to suppose that he would not execute a law passed by Congress constitutionally; and as an evidence that he means to carry out what he said he would accomplish, let me refer to the fact that in the shortest moment possible after your law was passed extending military rule over these States, and in exact accordance with the provisions of that law, he appointed to the command of the military districts which were created five officers entirely acceptable, as I have no doubt, to the American people, and they are now severally in the discharge of their respective duties.

Now, as to the suggestion made by the honorable member from Nevada, that before we can assemble again the Supreme Court of the United States, in the month of April or in the month of May, may be called upon to decide, and may decide, that the laws in question are unconstitutional, the honorable member should recollect that that tribunal has no original jurisdiction in a case of that description; and the only way in which the question can be brought before them is by a suit instituted in some of the courts below, either State or national, and brought by a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States. As the law stands, such writs of error can only be brought to the term of the Supreme Court succeeding the term of the State or national court at which the decision is had; and there is therefore no possible case in which the question can be brought before that tribunal before we shall assemble here in December.

Then the only other ground why we should not adjourn until the regular time of adjournment is the one which has been stated by several Senators on the floor, that we are to watch the President. Watch him how? We have, if it can be called watching, taken from him by legislation powers which, from the beginning of the Government up to the period of that legislation, had been exercised by every other President without any protest, much less legislation, on the part of Congress; and he has now no power left except the mere power of seeing that the laws are faithfully executed; and the question with him in reference to any of those laws is, is it a law in the sense of the Constitution; and that he will decide, as every man in his situation would be compelled to decide, by ascertaining whether the law was constitutionally passed; and coming to that decision, as an officer and as a citizen, he would be bound to comply with it until it should be annulled by some judicial decision. I believe, therefore, as much as I believe in any fact in the future, that the President of the United States will as faithfully discharge the duty imposed upon him by those laws as I believe that the honorable member from Massachusetts will discharge any duty which he supposes to be devolved upon him.

Now, sir, as to the President of the United States having lost the entire confidence of the country, and as to the country desiring that we should come back at an early day, there may be differences of opinion. It may be that in the judgment of a majority of the people, however they may disapprove of the conduct of the Executive in the past or in the future prospectively, looking to the State of things now existing, they are exceedingly anxious that Congress shall adjourn. I am of that opinion. From the information given to me by gentlemen belonging to the Republican party, and by a large portion of the press which entertain the opinions of that party, they desire Congress to adjourn, I will not say because they are dissatisfied with what Congress has done, but because they believe that Congress has done all that is necessary to protect the country, and they fear that if it remains here longer it may do something that will have a contrary result. Trade is now in a state of stagnation in all the larger cities, and it is said principally to be owing to the apprehension entertained as to what Congress will do. I hope, then, that we may adjourn to the day named.

Mr. YATES. I disagree with gentlemen as to the reason why this session of Congress was called, and I think it does no harm to let the country understand the truth about that matter. While I do not accuse my peers of stating what was untrue in regard to that point, I think there may be a difference of opinion as to the reasons why the present Congress was called together. There can be no dispute in my mind as to what the controlling reason was; and no Senator will deny that it was a want of confidence in the President of the United States in his honest determination to faithfully execute the laws of Congress. It was because of a want of confidence among ourselves and among the people of the United States in the President, because he had abandoned the Union party, because he had gone over to the enemies of this country, because he was conniving with rebels to thwart the desires and designs of the Union people of the United States. Sir, there stands out in broad and bold relief before this country that great reason why Congress is here to-day. It cannot be denied; it is a fact; it is history, and it will be history forever.

In view of that reason why should Congress abandon its purpose; why should it give up its session; why should Senators and Representatives retire from their seats here when the reason for which they were called together still exists in full force? Has the country any more confidence in the President now than it had when this session was called together? What has he done to inspire new confidence? Is it veto after veto of your measures? Is it conformity to the wishes and designs and devices of the rebels of this country? Are we any more satisfied to-day than we were when this session was called together that the President will faithfully coöperate with Congress in the execution of the laws which it has passed? Are we satisfied that he is any more the friend of the country to-day than he was when this session was called together? Sir, the same reason exists to-day that existed a month ago or six months ago, and in greater force. Why? I will tell you why.

If this Congress shall maintain its position before the country, I do not say keep in continuous session, but if it shall preserve its position to protect the country, the laws you have passed will be executed, faithfully executed. If not, if we abandon our posts, if we leave this Government in the hands of an Executive who sympathizes with the policy and views of our enemies, who believes that rebels and traitors, with the blood of our own Union soldiers upon their hands, are now entitled to seats upon this floor without any qualifications or conditions or oaths of allegiance to the country, I for one do not know what the result may be. I confess I cannot see any reason now for our adjournment which did not exist when this session was called together.

I maintain that what I have stated was the reason why this session was called; and now shall we go before the country and say that that was not a sufficient reason, or that it has ceased to exist when in point of fact it still exists in greater force than at any other time, when upon this very day that you propose to adjourn the President hurls his bolts of defiance in your faces, and tells you that your action, your law, is unconstitutional, and of course, therefore, ought not to be enforced? If he enforces it at all it will be that feeble enforcement which will not do good, which will not accomplish the designs and the objects of the Union men of this country. We appoint him and his agents to secure the boon of universal suffrage to a long-oppressed race. Will he do it? While we, in the exercise of that vigilance of which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has spoken, have stood at our posts, we have curbed the abuses of executive power. Yes, sir, we have seen the effect of our being here; we have seen that Congress has been potent, to some extent, to restrain the usurpations of the President and the injuries which he might otherwise inflict upon the country. I maintain now, and shall ever believe, that it will be a fatal step if, under all the circumstances of the case, after Congress has promulgated these very opinions which the people now entertain as to the President and his policy, we leave our posts. It will be an act of moral and political cowardice, I repeat, which the people will and ought to hold us responsible for. I say again, I do not propose a continuous session, but I do propose that some plan be adopted, some resolution passed, by which we shall maintain ourselves in position to protect the country from executive encroachments and to see that the laws are executed and the policy which we have so wisely inaugurated fairly and properly carried out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution under consideration, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. NYE. Before the vote is taken I desire to state that I am paired off with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] on this question. I presume if he were here he would vote in the affirmative and I would vote in the negative.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doollittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Cole, Cragin, Drake, Fowler, Harlan, Howard, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Pomroy, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, and Yates—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Norton, Nye, and Riddle—8.

So the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 23, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., Hon. ROBERT C. SCHENCK, of Ohio, in the chair as Speaker pro tempore. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

INCREASED FORCE FOR PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. MYERS. I ask consent of the House to take up and put upon its passage at this time a bill already introduced by myself, House bill No. 28, to increase the force of the Patent Office. It is a bill which, as I stated yesterday, has been prepared at the request of the Commissioner of Patents, and the passage of which is required by the pressing business of the Patent Office.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to move to go to business on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not until after the morning hour.

Mr. MYERS. As the bill has already been read once, I will state its provisions—

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be read for information, reserving the right to object.

The bill, which was read for information, provides in the first section that the Commissioner of Patents be authorized from time to time to appoint, in the manner already provided for by law, such an additional number of principal examiners, first assistant examiners, and second assistant examiners as may be required to transact the current business of the office with dispatch. The whole number of such additional examiners is not to exceed four of each class, and the total annual expense of the Patent Office is not to exceed its annual receipts.

The second section proposes to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to appoint, by and with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, a solicitor of the Patent Office, who is to be considered its law officer, whose salary is to be $3,000 per annum, to be paid from the patent fund, and whose duty will be to render all reasonable aid in the transaction of the business of said office that may be required of him by the Commissioner.

It is provided in the third section that the salary of the first assistant examiners and disbursing clerk shall be $2,000, and the salary of the librarian shall be $2,500, which is to be in full for his services as translator and librarian.

Mr. ROSS. I object to the consideration of this bill at the present time, and call for the regular order.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the rules be suspended, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill I had supposed that no member would object to.

On the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes twenty-five, noes not counted.

Mr. MYERS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MYERS and ROSS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes fifty-seven, noes not counted.

So the rules were suspended; and the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 28) to increase the force of the Patent Office.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, I can I think, in a very few words, satisfy the House of the propriety and indeed the necessity of passing this bill.

There has been no increase of the force of the Patent Office since 1859. Since that time the business of the office has increased one hundred per cent.; since 1865 alone over fifty per cent. During the year 1865 there were ten thousand six hundred and sixty-four applications for patents, and sixty-six hundred and sixteen were granted. In 1866 there were fifteen thousand two hundred and sixty-nine applications, of which ninety-four hundred and fifty were granted. The number of caveats filed in 1865 was ten hundred and sixty-three; in 1866 there were twenty-seven hundred and twenty-three.

This bill proposes to authorize the employment of only four additional examiners of each class—twelve in all. I scarcely need to remind the House of the fact, known to most of the members, that the Patent Office is self-supporting, and hence this increase of force will take no money from the public Treasury; the additional expense will be paid from the patent fund. The Commissioner of Patents states that on account of the pressure of business in the office parties are frequently delayed for months in having their applications attended to. I believe this House will not disregard a statement from the chief officer of this or any other bureau or Department of the Government declaring the force under his direction insufficient for the transaction of the public business. The passage of this bill will not only relieve the overtasked employes now in the office, but give great satisfaction to the mechanics and scientific men of the country, who have an interest in the matter and a right to demand that the business of the Department shall be expedited.

It is specially provided that the additional expense shall be taken from the Patent Office fund; and also that in no event shall the number of additional examiners under this bill exceed twelve. Most of the work to be done is not merely clerical, but brain work—work frequently requiring the highest knowledge in the various branches of science and business. At least twelve more examiners or assistant examiners are needed to bring up the present work on hand.

Mr. UPSON. I was not aware this bill was going to be introduced to-day, but in verification and support of what my friend from Pennsylvania has said I will state that I had occasion myself to transact business with the Patent Office. An application for a patent was filed there last December, and the other day on calling to ascertain why it was not acted on I was told with the present force it was impossible to keep up the business as it came in, and that my case would not be reached in regular order for several weeks.

Mr. MYERS. Every member will find that to be the case if he will inquire at the Patent Office, and I am glad my friend from Michigan [Mr. Upson] has stated his experience on the subject.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to make another remark. The last section of the bill adds $200 to the salary of the first assistant examiners, the disbursing clerk, and librarian, to be paid from the Patent Office fund. The librarian now gets $1,800, and so much per hundred words for translation, in all amounting to about twenty-three hundred dollars. Instead of requiring this computation we give him $2,500, saving trouble, and ranking him with the primary examiners.

If gentlemen have no questions to ask I will now call for the previous question.

Mr. ROSS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. MYERS. Only for a question.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to say that I did not oppose the introduction of the measure because I knew of any objection to it; but I do think when two gentlemen have spoken in favor of a measure just presented, at least some one who opposed it should be heard; at least some one should be allowed to state why he deemed it inexpedient to pass it at this time.

Mr. MYERS. I am now yielding for that purpose.

Mr. ROSS. You said only for a question. I desire to say that I do not think it is expedient at this time to press upon the consideration of the House a bill of this character. It is alleged to be important that there should be additional men in this bureau. Then why, I want to know, did not the Committee on Patents, during three months of last session, find that out? If it was not so important as to be brought forward then, I think it can wait a little longer. I think it would be wiser and more prudent to defer pressing it now, when sixteen States are unrepresented and there are no committees to examine into these matters.

If it were as important as is alleged, then the committee were derelict in not having brought it to the attention of the House at the last session. I think a measure of this character ought first to be referred for investigation to one of the standing committees. It is right that it should be inquired into and a report made. I look with suspicion upon all measures pressed in this way upon the consideration of the House. If we should go on in this way I believe we will find that we have committed many errors by this hasty legislation.

Mr. MYERS. I will now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Chanler,] who was my colleague on the Committee on Patents, and who knows that for nearly two months of last session we had no chance to report.

Mr. WARD. I wish to ask a question. Was not this force increased at the last session of Congress?

Mr. MYERS. No, sir; it has not been increased since 1859, as I have already stated.

Mr. CHANLER. My object in rising is to say that neither my colleague nor the committee were derelict in this matter. It is well known to the Speaker, who is now absent, that my colleague on the committee has for weeks past been endeavoring to bring this bill before the House for consideration. He has been superseded by reason of his amiability and the great pressure of business.

Mr. ROSS. Let me ask a question. Did not the committee get time to revamp some old patents and urge them upon the attention of the House, leaving this behind?

Mr. CHANLER. Not at all. I do not understand upon what proof my friend from Illinois makes such sweeping, and I must say such unjust charges against the Committee on Patents. The committee has been able to do less than was desired in the very few cases we reported because of the prejudice against the extension of patents, and it seems to me all business coming from the Committee on Patents. The gentleman has found it to be his duty, for what reason I cannot understand, to try and break down this bill.

Now, sir, the Committee on Patents are not answerable for the omission of other business in the pressure upon them to bring before the House measures for the benefit of persons who have no channel of communication except through the Committee on Patents. In presenting this measure at this time my friend has acted in the discharge of his duty and with the consent and approbation of the other members of the Committee on Patents of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

Mr. MYERS. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. BALDWIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MYERS. I want to answer all questions on this subject; therefore I yield to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. BALDWIN. This seems to me altogether too important a matter to be put through here in this way under the previous question. It may be that the bill ought to pass, but I do not know that yet. I have not seen any reason why it should pass; and I do not suppose I am likely to see any. I think we ought not to go on rushing business through the House in this way which does not come to us from a committee of the House.

Mr. MYERS. I decline to yield for a speech; I am willing to answer a question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I desire to ask what is the amount of the increase of salary under this bill?

Mr. MYERS. I have tried to make myself understood, and I believe if gentlemen had listened to me there would be no necessity for such an inquiry. The force is to be increased by a number of assistants not exceeding twelve. The business has increased in one year nearly one hundred per cent. The Commissioner of Patents states a fact, which many of us know, that the business is in arrears, and has been for months, because there is not sufficient force to act upon it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I do not object to having sufficient force, but to the increase of salaries.

Mr. MYERS. The salaries of one class, consisting of sixteen men, are increased $200. They comprise the intermediate class between the $2,500 and the $1,600 class, and are called first assistant examiners. The librarian, as I stated before, now gets a salary of $1,800, and in addition thereto so much per folio for transcribing. This bill gives him a salary of $2,500 in lieu of both. It is a very slight increase; he now realizes about twenty-three hundred. It saves the trouble of counting the words. The whole increase is $3,400, all of which comes out of the Patent Office fund.

I desire to make one statement that I have omitted. The Patent Office fund is now $264,000, having increased in 1866 from the previous year $134,000, from which this little increase is to be taken, while the added force will no doubt far more than repay it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Allow me to ask one more question.

Mr. MYERS. I yield for a single question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Would it not be better to reduce the fees of the Patent Office than to increase the salaries?

Mr. MYERS. I think the increase is proper. The public have not asked a reduction of the fees. They need sufficient employes to attend to their wants, and competent men deserve a proper remuneration.

Mr. MILLER. Does this make any additional appropriation?

Mr. MYERS. Not one cent from the Treasury.

On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 50, noes 7; no quorum voting.

The Chair ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. MYERS and BALDWIN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes seventy-eight, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MYERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notified the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the joint resolution of the Senate No. 19, directing the Secretary of War to furnish certain Army equipments to the State of Tennessee.

Also that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the joint resolution of the Senate No. 29, to terminate a contract of a member of Congress with the Post Office Department.

Also that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 72, to exempt wrapping-paper made of wood and corn-stalks from internal revenue tax.

Also that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the House No. 8, directing the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the execution of the law passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PERHAM. I ask consent of the House to have taken from the Speaker's table a pension bill for action at the present time, and if no objection be made I will explain in a few words the object of the bill, and then I think no one can object to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PERHAM] will accomplish his purpose quite as well by submitting a motion to go to business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. BROOMALL. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order having been called for, the morning hour will now commence. The first business in order during the morning hour is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House now proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that until the call of committees has been concluded his motion to be adopted will require a two-thirds vote.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Is it in order to move to suspend the rules during the morning hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] doubtless forgets that some days since a resolution was adopted by the House which permits such a motion as the one made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] But, the morning hour having commenced, upon the call for the regular order of business, it will require a two-thirds vote to proceed to business on the Speaker's table until committees have been called for reports. After that call a majority vote will be sufficient.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes thirty-five.

Before the noes were counted,

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BROOMALL and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 70, noes 17.

So (two-thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

The House accordingly proceeded to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

IMPORTATION OF WORKS OF ART.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of amendments of the Senate to House joint resolution No. 25, providing for the importation into the United States of certain works of art duty free.

The Clerk read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the resolution and to insert the following:

That from and after the passage of this joint resolution any object of art imported by any individual or association of individuals for presentation, as a gift to the United States Government, or to any State, county, or municipal government, shall be admitted free of duty, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to refund the duties paid on any steam agricultural machinery imported into the United States during the current fiscal year as models or for experimentation, and to remit the duties on any steam machinery of like description which may be imported for such purposes prior to the 30th of June, 1863.

And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to discontinue the employment of any officer or person employed under the acts for the collection of direct taxes in the insurrectionary districts within the United States whenever, in his judgment, their services no longer needed; and he is hereby authorized to devolve upon any officer or officers of internal revenue in said districts any portion of the duties imposed in said acts, who shall perform said duties without additional compensation.

Mr. ALLISON. This joint resolution of the House, which passed this body a day or two ago, related only to the importation of works of art. The Senate have added an amendment in relation to the importation of agricultural steam machinery. The object of that amendment is simply to allow the introduction of steam machinery, which is now manufactured only in Great Britain, free of duty for purposes of experimentation only. That provision I believe has been contained in almost every tariff act for the last four or five years. It was also embraced in the bill before the House during the last session, but which failed to become a law. It is really important that it should pass now, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

In relation to the last section of the Senate amendment, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue certain officers in the southern States, there can be I think no objection. It will save much expense to the Government, and I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I should like to have an amendment adopted striking out the section in relation to the importation of steam machinery.

Mr. ALLISON. That section relates merely to steam agricultural machinery, and particularly to steam-plows for use upon our western prairie. They are not manufactured in this country, and only three or four of them have yet been imported. This section is intended to encourage the introduction of this kind of machinery into use in this country.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I suggest to the gentleman that the language of the section is broad enough to authorize the introduction of various kinds of machinery. It should be in some way amended so as to confine it to such machinery as the gentleman states is designed to be included.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Let it be read again.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Clerk to read the second section.

The Clerk read as follows:

And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to refund the duties paid on any steam agricultural machinery imported into the United States during the current fiscal year as models or for experimentation, and to remit the duties on any steam machinery of like description which may be imported for such purposes prior to the 30th of June, 1863.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. My friend will see that that is much broader than he states.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I rise to a point of order, that this bill, in the provision for refunding duties already made, contains an appropriation and must go under the rule to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to a point of order, which is that it is too late to make that point now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order upon two grounds: first, that it is too late to raise the point even if it were well taken; and in the next place, that, in the opinion of the Chair, the bill contains no such appropriation as would require it to go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PRUYN. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa whether the first section of the act is as broad as it should be. It applies only to State and city authorities. It ought, it strikes me, to apply to art associations and bodies corporate generally. I think broader language ought to be used.

Mr. ALLISON. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the present language of the bill is quite broad enough. It applies only to States and to county and municipal corporations. I think this is as far as it should go.

Mr. PRUYN. Suppose a gift should be made to an art association, which in point of fact represents a town or municipality?

Mr. ALLISON. I think that perhaps the present language is sufficiently broad. It is difficult enough to get it through even in its present form. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to offer an amendment as an additional section.

Mr. ALLISON. I will hear the amendment read without yielding to permit it to be offered.

Mr. BUTLER. What I desire to add as an amendment is the following:

That all material called lastings, used in the manufacture of shoes, shall be admitted at a specific duty of fifty per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. Speaker, at the last session the House and the Senate attempted to accomplish that which this amendment proposes to effect. They repealed the law of 1864, thereby reviving the law of 1862, which, however, is precisely similar in this respect to the law of 1864. Hence the object contemplated by the act of last session has not been accomplished. Under the law as it stands at present lastings come in under a duty of from eighty-five to ninety per cent. There are none manufactured in this country. The burden of this duty falls upon the consumer. It protects no industrial interest of the country. My proposition is designed simply to carry into effect the law of last session.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he insert also the provision for beet-sugar apparatus, of which we have heard a great deal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is compelled to rule that unless the gentleman from Iowa yields to allow the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts to be offered, discussion upon that amendment is not in order. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to permit the amendment to be offered?

Mr. ALLISON. I should be very glad to yield to the gentleman, but at the instance of the gentleman's immediate predecessor this subject of lastings was arranged just at the close of the last session.

Mr. BUTLER. That gentleman was mistaken in the effect of the law as now construed by the revenue officers.

Mr. ALLISON. I think, under the circumstances, I cannot permit the amendment to be offered. I yield a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTFIELD.]

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I ask the gentleman who has the bill in charge what amount of money this bill will take out of the Treasury?

Mr. ALLISON. It will take about two thousand dollars to pay the duties upon one large steam-plow which was imported into this country just after one law expired and before another commenced. This plow is now in the city of Philadelphia, in the State in part represented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and as soon as this bill becomes a law will be taken West and used for experimental purposes upon the prairies of Illinois or Iowa.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask whether it would not answer the gentleman's purpose to say that this section shall only apply to steam-plows?

Mr. ALLISON. I think that the section is now sufficiently guarded.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. If that's all the gentleman wants I do not see why he will not yield to my colleague's suggestion.

Mr. ALLISON. That is all I want, and I do not object to the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Then I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That this section shall only apply to steam-plows.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me the amendment is unnecessary. The section only applies to steam agricultural implements. If there be any other steam agricultural implement why not let it come in also? It is narrow enough now. If you amend the bill it will have to go back to the Senate, and in the brief time we are to remain here I think we should avoid that.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It is too broad as it is.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not think there is any danger of the importation of any foreign iron or steel under this section.

Mr. ALLISON. This section is only intended to apply to steam-plows, and therefore I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. As the bill is to go back to the Senate I want it to go back in good English. There is no such word as "experimentation."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Cannot we make it by law? [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. What does the gentleman suggest in its place?

Mr. BROOKS. "Experimental purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was concurred in.

Second amendment of the Senate:

Amend the title by adding, "and for other purposes."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF JOHN E. BOULIGNY.

The next business on the Speaker's table were the amendments of the Senate to House joint resolution No. 8, directing the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the execution of a law passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny.

First amendment of the Senate:

Strike out the following:

Whereas during the last hours of the Thirty-Ninth Congress an act was passed, without discussion, for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny, granting to said heirs land warrants for seventy-five thousand eight hundred and forty acres of land; and whereas by the solemn judgment and decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, after full hearing, it was in the year 1855 adjudged that the private land claim on which said act is based was invalid, null, and void; and whereas Mr. Justice Nelson, who delivered the opinion of the court, declared that there was no record evidence of any such land grant as was set up, "that none had been produced, though a thorough examination of the archives of that date, both at New Orleans and Paris, had been made, and no records could be found;" and whereas it was also declared by said Judge Nelson that there was not the "slightest ground for the claim set up" to a tract of land running back from the Mississippi river to the Atchafalaya; and that, at the most, the petitioners could not claim, under any grant or survey, over two thousand five hundred or three thousand acres, instead of about half a million; the report of which decision is found in 15 Howard's Reports, page 14; and whereas said private land claim, after full review by Hon. M. Burchard, Solicitor of the General Land Office, in 1838, was declared as invalid and void; and whereas said pretended private land claim had its origin in 1717, and was a part of the celebrated Mississippi scheme, with which John Law, known for his connection with the South Sea bubble, was a party; and whereas to revive and legalize this claim will revive and legalize claims to the amount of many millions of acres; and whereas there is grave reason for believing that said act was passed under a misapprehension of the facts: Therefore.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. At the last session a bill was passed by both Houses, and was approved by the President, giving certain relief to the heirs of John E. Bouligny. At the commencement of this session of the Fortieth Congress the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] introduced a long resolution charging that there was no foundation for the claim, that it was reported against the evidence, that it was illegal, and asking that the law should be virtually repealed. When it is proposed upon the statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin against the reports of the committees and the votes of the two Houses virtually to repeal existing law, it strikes me as eminently proper it should be sent to the Law Committee of the House to ascertain whether the charges made are correct or not. It is an improper and dangerous way of repealing a law by the passage of a joint resolution of this character without reference to any committee for examination. I believe it is unheard of that a law upon the statute-book shall be stricken out merely because a gentleman states it is an improper law, without investigation by the appropriate committee.

As this involves questions of law merely I think the Judiciary Committee is the one that should investigate the whole matter. I have some feeling on this subject from the fact that the course of the gentleman from Wisconsin is an imputation upon the committees of the Thirty-Ninth Congress which reported and the two Houses which passed this bill.

If there was anything wrong in the passage of this bill, if upon further examination it is found that either the committee or the House were deceived in the matter, I for one will be ready to repeal the act. But I do say it is just to the claimants, to the committees, and to the Thirty-Ninth Congress that this resolution should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for investigation of its merits, to ascertain whether these charges that have been preferred to the bill, to say nothing more, are true or not. I hope at least that the House will sufficiently consider this matter, in which there are involved so large private interests, and allow the committee to give it a fair investigation. I am sure the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] cannot be influenced in this matter by private feelings. I would not charge him with such motives; I do not believe he can entertain them; and if he does not, he certainly can have no objection to having the whole matter investigated in its legal aspects by the Committee on the Judiciary. I hope he will make no objection. I certainly can see no impropriety in it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I certainly must object to this reference. The gentleman well knows that if this Congress does not act promptly the law will be executed. Before a committee has time to examine and report upon it these parties may have their land warrants in their pockets and may go into the market and dispose of them. I have no personal feeling in this matter further than a desire to do my duty. I became acquainted with this case long before I knew there was any such person in existence as John E. Bouligny, and I made up my mind as to the character of the claim then.

In regard to the facts which I stated in the preamble of the resolution, I have only to say this: that when I shall have time accorded to me for that purpose, I shall be able to demonstrate every fact stated by me. I do not feel justified in occupying the attention of the House now for that purpose. I will simply state this fact: that the Senate of the United States, having been put upon the inquiry by this resolution, referred it to the Committee on Private Land Claims of that branch, the same committee that reported the former bill, whereupon that committee reversed its action. And if you will look at the discussion which is reported in the Globe of to-day you will find that the Senator from Oregon declared that it was the most astonishing case of mistake that ever came before Congress. He states the circumstances under which it was passed. The Senate had taken for granted the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, who stood high in the confidence of that body. But upon a review of the case, the present chairman of the same committee stated that under no circumstances of the case can there be a valid grant to exceed eight or nine thousand acres, instead of four hundred and fifty thousand. I ask gentlemen to look at the discussion which took place in the Senate yesterday and day before. I do not wish to take up the time of the House now, but if this shall go back to be revised I hope the gentleman from Vermont may have an opportunity of examining it, and I promise that I will demonstrate, if it should ever again come before the House, that everything I stated in the preamble of the resolution is true.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. With the permission of the gentleman I propose to have this referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, because there is no committee now appointed in the Fortieth Congress on Private Land Claims, and that committee may not be appointed for a month to come, and I think it nothing but right that these parties should have a chance to have the question investigated by a committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. It is well known that Congress will adjourn in a few days. If it does, there will be no opportunity to examine and report upon this resolution; so that the effect of the reference will be that this law will be executed before Congress meets again. For that reason I am opposed to the reference. Were it otherwise I might not object. I would inquire of the Chair if the motion to concur does not take precedence of the motion to refer?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to concur is pending, and the gentleman from Vermont moves, pending that motion, to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary. If the previous question is seconded the House will first vote on the motion to refer, and if that is not carried then the question will recur upon the motion to concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, in addition to what I said when this was up the other day, I merely wish now to add that in my opinion, under the whole situation of the case as it now stands, the House should non-concur in the amendment of the Senate, and then let the resolution be referred to the appropriate committee for thorough examination. If the claim is meritorious it will be so found; if not, then the finding will be accordingly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I have no objection to the amendment of the Senate striking out the preamble. All I want is that this matter shall be hung up until Congress shall again investigate it, so that every one may have the opportunity to examine the case for himself. Now, inasmuch as it has been alleged that there is error in that preamble, as I have already stated, whenever I shall have an opportunity to do so I can demonstrate its correctness.

There is, perhaps, some misunderstanding growing out of the question as to whether the Supreme Court of the United States, having decided that they had no jurisdiction, had any authority to go on and declare, as they did declare, that the claim was invalid. I will not dispute that point, for it is the same that was involved in the Dred Scott decision. But having decided that they had no jurisdiction, Judge Nelson proceeded to state, in which statement a majority of the court agreed, that even if the court had jurisdiction the claim was not a valid one. A minority of the court declared that, as the court had no jurisdiction, they would not go into the examination of the merits of the case. Now, if there is any misstatement of fact in the preamble, it arises from that fact. I stated that the Supreme Court decided that the claim was illegal; though at the same time they decided that there was no jurisdiction. In regard to the other facts recited in the preamble, I think there can be no dispute.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to say a few words in reference to this case, because I was a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims in the Senate which reported the bill that this joint resolution proposes to suspend. This joint resolution as it passed the House, especially the preamble with which it was prefaced, was not very complimentary to the committee of this House or the committee of the Senate that reported the original bill. Now, I agree that if the facts which are stated in that preamble are true, then it was a very gross blunder on the committees who reported that bill, and quite as gross a blunder on the part of each House which passed it. I think, therefore, it is due to the committees and to both Houses that before we substantially repeal the present law the subject should be referred to a committee for further consideration. We should not, upon an ex parte statement in a preamble introduced by a member of this House, substantially repeal a law which both Houses have united in passing after it had been reported upon favorably by committees of both Houses. Therefore it seems to me that the motion of my colleague, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE.] that this joint resolution should be sent to a committee to be further examined, should be agreed to, as due not only to those who are interested in this claim, but to the committees who before examined the subject.

Now, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WASHBURN] objects to this course on the ground that unless we pass this joint resolution, unless we have instantaneous action upon this subject by Congress, the Secretary of the Interior will act under the law and will issue warrants for the land. Now, I apprehend that there is no danger that any Department of the Government will so act while there is pending before Congress a proposition substantially to repeal that law.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] one single question, because I have very great respect for his opinion. If we shall pursue this course which he advises us to pursue, then what guarantee will we have that those land warrants will not be issued? This subject cannot be acted upon by any committee before the next session of Congress, and by that time the land will be sold, and it will pass into the hands of innocent purchasers, and the Government will have no redress at all. On the other hand, if we act upon this matter as proposed by this joint resolution, no injury will result to the Government or to any one.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I think one very good answer is this: I do not believe that any officer at the head of any Department of this Government would undertake to execute a law, in a case involving the payment of money or the issue of warrants for land, while a bill or resolution for the repeal of that law was pending. But, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] or the gentleman who is the author of this resolution, has not confidence enough in the Secretary of the Interior to believe that he will not execute the law while this proposition for its repeal is pending, I for one am perfectly willing that this resolution shall be so amended as to forbid the Secretary of the Interior to execute the law of last session while this matter is being examined by a committee of this House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. That is what we ask and propose to accomplish by this resolution: that the act of last session shall be suspended until the case shall be revised by the proper committee.

Mr. POLAND. The objection to the resolution in the form in which it stands is that it operates substantially as a repeal of the law, and if it be passed the parties interested will be obliged to come before Congress and again go through with this matter; while I think the burden should be thrown upon those who say that this is an unjust claim. The case having been investigated by committees of both Houses, and the act having been passed by both Houses, it should stand until it be shown by those who oppose this claim that it is unjust. It should not be substantially repealed upon the mere statement of a member or a suggestion that the question has been acted upon by a committee of the other House, or a recital of what has been said in debate by a member of the Senate. These, it seems to me, constitute very unsatisfactory grounds upon which to act in a matter of this kind.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House will adopt the motion of my colleague, to refer this resolution to a committee and have the question investigated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Vermont that in offering this preamble and resolution I intended no reflection upon the committee that considered the subject in the last Congress or upon the action of either House. The gentleman says that the passage of this resolution will place the committee in a bad position before the country. Sir, I cannot help that. If on their recommendation an unjust and unwise act has been passed, it is very proper that it should be corrected; and there is no reason why they should not shoulder the responsibility which may attach to their action. I desire also to say that if this resolution should now be referred, and this case should not be finally disposed of, the Secretary of the Interior will have no right to refuse to execute the law of last session. He will be bound to execute it when called on by the parties interested.

If gentlemen will but take the pains to examine the discussion which has taken place in the Senate within the last few days, they will be convinced that there is really no justice in this claim. This resolution does not repeal the law already passed; but, sir, I have no hesitation in saying that such will be the effect of it; for gentlemen may rely upon it that neither this nor any other Congress will ever sanction this claim hereafter.

I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I propose to say only a word or two in regard to this matter. It strikes me very forcibly that the course which the gentleman from Wisconsin asks the House to take in regard to this measure is not only extraordinary, but unprecedented, and it seems to me that it cannot be justified on any sound principles of legislation. Here is a measure which has been pending before Congress for a number of years. It has been before the regular committees of both Houses, and has been time and again passed upon favorably. It has passed one and the other House of Congress in a number of Congresses, but has failed to pass both at the same Congress from want of time. Now, everybody knows in reference to private claims of this kind, unless there is some person to follow it up, it is almost impossible to get any action of the two Houses. It is, I believe, unheard of in the legislation of the country when a measure has undergone the ordeal to which I have referred, when a law has passed both Houses of Congress, and been approved by the President, to agree on the mere statement of a single member, I care not how high is his standing, to repeal that law, and that, too, without letting the motion for repeal undergo any investigation by any committee of this House.

If this passes it is a repeal of this law; and I care not how meritorious the measure may be, this widow and her children will not get anything from the Government. It is extraordinary that we should in this hurried way, without the least inquiry, repeal a law reported by such an able committee as we had in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, at the head of which was the gentleman from Philadelphia, Mr. Thayer; and, sir, I have it from his own mouth that he gave the measure a careful personal investigation. He is, as everybody here who knew him will admit, an able lawyer and a gentleman of unquestioned integrity. Now, sir, a proposition brought before the House with all these guarantees, carefully examined by committees and deliberately agreed to by both Houses, to be repealed without reference to any committee, I say is not only extraordinary, but unprecedented; certainly unwarranted by any principle by which a legislative body should be governed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. It is stated by the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims in the Senate that on reexamination it has been found a great mistake has been made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will remind gentlemen that it is in violation of the rules to refer to what has taken place in the other branch of Congress. This House must act irrespective of the other.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. If, then, the gentleman will look in the Globe he will find it stated there by a gentleman who is to be believed, and who occupies a high position, that under no state of the case did the claim of these parties exceed eight or nine thousand acres instead of four hundred and fifty thousand, as provided for in the law proposed to be repealed. If he believes that, would it be right for us to arrest that legislation? If it is unprecedented, would it not be well for us to establish that kind of precedent? I hope cases like this are unprecedented; I know of none other during my service here.

Mr. MARSHALL. If this claim be fraudulent, certainly no member of this Congress ought to wish it to be paid; but what I say is that it is unprecedented, and contrary to all sound principles of legislation, that this House should repeal a law for relief in a private claim which was passed, after careful deliberation, by a joint resolution, which has been referred to no committee for investigation and report.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to ask a question, whether upon knowledge this House now has, both from statements made by its own members upon this floor, and from information received from other trustworthy sources, it is not probable a very great mistake has been committed by which this country is to be deprived of a pretty large quantity of land of considerable value to the Government; and whether that being so, it is not the duty of the Representatives of the people to arrest this proceeding until an investigation can be had?

Mr. MARSHALL. In answer to that I wish to say I see no propriety in the action proposed in this case any more than in any other case where a suggestion has been made by a member that a law has been passed which ought not to have been passed. I do not object to the investigation of this measure in a proper way, and to repeal it if that shall be found necessary.

But it is said that this Congress is about to adjourn. If you pass this proposition it will be a virtual defeat of this measure forever, whether it is just or not. This widow and her orphan children with all these discouragements will in all probability never again prosecute their claim. It has been here for year after year. I understand it passed the House when the gentleman from Wisconsin was a member, and on the report of the committee of which he also was a member. It has been passed time and again. I do not say it should not be investigated again, but after the solemn action of Congress I do say that it should not be repealed and set aside without the subject being referred to any committee for examination on the mere ex parte statement of a member of this House.

The gentleman refers to the action of the Senate, and it has been well suggested that that is not a proper subject of discussion here. But as he refers to the Globe, I will also refer to it. It will be seen by the report of the proceedings of the Senate published in the Globe that a gentleman who stands as high in point of legal attainments as any in this country, one of the ablest jurists in the Senate, insists that this claim is just and honest, and ought to be paid. So that it is not, by any means, a clear case that the passage of this law was wrong in fact. On the contrary, the weight of evidence is altogether in its favor. While I do not now insist that the House shall stand by its former action, I insist that it is unjust to repeal this law, for that is what this resolution does—absolutely repeals it; puts it back where it was before there was any action of Congress upon it. It is just as if you should introduce a bill in so many words repealing an act passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress without any action by any committee of the House upon the bill. I say that it is unjust to these claimants, it is unprecedented, it is an unsafe principle of legislation, and it is an unjust reflection upon a committee of the Thirty-Ninth Congress who laboriously investigated it and reported in its favor. The honorable chairman of the committee is a gentleman of whom all who know him will bear me out in saying that he is a man of the highest legal attainments, and of most unquestionable integrity, and he, after investigation, took the deepest interest in the passage of the measure, as I know.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to answer a question of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I think it is quite unnecessary to take up the time of the House any further. The House understands the question now as well as it will upon further discussion. Most of the time has been occupied already by those who are endeavoring to sustain this act. I could occupy one hour in demonstrating the truth of everything I have stated, but I do not want to go into the merits of the question further now. All I desire is that the action of Congress may be reviewed, and I shall interpose no factious opposition if upon review the House shall consider it a just claim. All I want is to have it fairly before the House and understood. I do not propose to take any advantage of anybody if the House upon a full and fair investigation shall consider it just and proper. I do not believe it is, as I have stated. I demand the previous question.

M. WOODBRIDGE. I ask the gentleman to yield.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I decline. Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Then I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 61 noes 32; and the main question ordered.

The question was first on the motion to refer; and being put, there were—ayes twenty-nine.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. WOODBRIDGE and WASHBURN, of Wisconsin.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-two, noes not counted.

So the motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary was disagreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the amendments of the Senate; and they were agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, moved to reconsider the votes by which the amendments of the Senate were agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, notified the House that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolution of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 105) to reimburse the States of Indiana and Ohio, for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and provisioning militia forces, and in suppressing the rebellion; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 43) in relation to the educational interests of the District of Columbia.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEEDS IN DISTRICT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of Senate bill No. 38, in relation to the acknowledgment of deeds in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that hereafter acknowledgments of deeds for the conveyance of real estate in the District of Columbia may be taken by the recorder of deeds for said District, or by a single justice of the peace; and any such acknowledgment heretofore taken by a single justice of the peace is hereby made and declared to be a valid acknowledgment, provided that nothing in this act shall be held to impair the title of bona fide purchasers who by conveyances and formal acknowledgment have, prior to the passage of this act, acquired paramount title under existing laws.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I desire to state to the House that this bill has been considered by the Committee on the Judiciary of this House, and it meets with their unanimous approval. It merely provides that where an acknowledgment has been taken by a single justice of the peace, the law requiring that it shall be taken by two justices, the deed shall not be thereby rendered invalid. It also provides that there shall be no injury resulting to rights paramount which have accrued.

The bill was then read the third time; and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WEST VIRGINIA WAR CLAIMS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 77, supplemental to an act entitled "An act to reimburse the State of West Virginia for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and paying military forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion," approved June 21, 1866; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length. It provides that the money appropriated by the act to which this is supplemental shall be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I will state to the House that the passage of this bill is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. The law providing for the reimbursement of the war claims of West Virginia requires that those claims shall be audited under the supervision of the Treasury Department, while they properly belong to the War Department; and the object of this bill is to make such transfer. I trust there will be no objection. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States was delivered to the House by Colonel WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, announcing that the President had approved and signed a bill and joint resolutions, of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 19) to clothe the maimed and destitute soldiers;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 2) to authorize the refunding of discriminating duties exacted upon merchandise imported in Hawaiian vessels;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 10) in relation to certain coin and bullion on special deposit in the Treasury;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 17) authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over certain property of the United States at Camp Chase, Ohio, for the use of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 20) to supply an omission in the enrollment of the act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the President returned to the House, in which the same originated, a bill (H. R. No. 33) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration; with his objections thereto in writing.

RECONSTRUCTION—VETO.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now move that the House proceed to the reconsideration of the bill returned to the House by the President of the United States, with his objections thereto.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read the message, which was as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I have considered the bill entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration," and now return it to the House of Representatives with my objections.

This bill provides for elections in the ten States brought under the operation of the original act to which it is supplementary. Its details are principally directed to the elections for the formation of the State constitutions; but by the sixth section of the bill "all elections" in these States, occurring while the original act remains in force, are brought within its purview. Referring to the details, it will be found that, first of all, there is to be a registration of the voters. No one whose name has not been admitted on the list is to be allowed to vote at any of these elections. To ascertain who is entitled to registration reference is made necessary, by the express language of the supplement, to the original act and to the pending bill. The fifth section of the original act provides, as to voters, that they shall be "male citizens of the State, twenty-one years old and upward, of whatever race, color, or previous condition, who have been resident of said State for one year." This is the general qualification, followed, however, by many exceptions. No one can be registered, according to the original act, "who may be disfranchised for participation in the rebellion," a provision which left undetermined the question as to what amounted to disfranchisement, and whether, without a judicial sentence, the act itself produced that effect.

This supplemental bill superadds an oath to be taken by every person before his name can be admitted upon the registration, that he has "not been disfranchised for participation in any rebellion or civil war against the United States." It thus imposes upon every person the necessity and responsibility of deciding for himself, under the peril of punishment by a military commission if he makes a mistake, what works disfranchisement by participation in rebellion, and what amounts to such participation. Almost every man—the negro as well as the white—above twenty-one years of age, who was resident in these ten States during the rebellion, voluntarily or involuntarily, at some time and in some way, did participate in resistance to the lawful authority of the General Government. The question with the citizen to whom this oath is to be proposed must be a fearful one; for while the bill does not declare that perjury may be assigned for such false swearing, not fix any penalty for the offense, we must not forget that martial law prevails, that every person is answerable to a military commission, without previous presentment by a grand jury for any charge that may be made against him; and that the supreme authority of the military commander determines the question as to what is an offense and what is to be the measure of punishment. The fourth section of the bill provides—

That the commanding general of each district shall appoint as many boards of registration as may be necessary, consisting of three loyal officers or persons.

The only qualification stated for these officers is that they must be "loyal." They may be persons in the military service or civilians, residents of the State or strangers. Yet these persons are to exercise most important duties, and are vested with unlimited discretion. They are to decide what names shall be placed upon the register, and from their decision there is to be no appeal. They are to superintend the elections, and to decide all questions which may arise. They are to have the custody of the ballots, and to make return of the persons elected. Whatever frauds or errors they may commit must pass without redress. All that is left for the commanding general is to receive the returns of the elections, open the same, and ascertain who are chosen "according to the returns of the officers who conducted said elections." By such means, and with this sort of agency, are the conventions of delegates to be constituted.

As the delegates are to speak for the people, common justice would seem to require that they should have authority from the people themselves. No convention so constituted will in any sense represent the wishes of the inhabitants of these States; for under the all-embracing exceptions of these laws, by a construction which the uncertainty of the clause as to disfranchisement leaves open to the board of officers, the great body of the people may be excluded from the polls and from all opportunity of expressing their own wishes, or voting for delegates who will faithfully reflect their sentiments.

I do not deem it necessary further to investigate the details of this bill. No consideration could induce me to give my approval to such an election law for any purpose, and especially for the great purpose of framing the constitution of a State. If ever the American citizen should be left to the free exercise of his own judgment it is when he is engaged in the work of forming the fundamental law under which he is to live. That work is his work, and it cannot properly be taken out of his hands. All this legislation proceeds upon the contrary assumption, that the people of each of these States shall have no constitution except such as may be arbitrarily dictated by Congress and formed under the restraint of military rule. A plain statement of facts makes this evident.

In all these States there are existing constitutions, formed in the accustomed way by the people. Congress, however, declares that those constitutions are not "loyal and republican," and requires the people to form them anew. What then, in the opinion of Congress, is necessary to make the constitution of a State "loyal and republican?" The original act answers the question: it is universal negro suffrage—a question which the Federal Constitution leaves to the States themselves. All this legislative machinery of martial law, military coercion, and political disfranchisement is avowedly for that purpose and none other. The existing constitutions of the ten States conform to the acknowledged standards of loyalty and republicanism. Indeed, if there are degrees in republican forms of government their constitutions are more republican now than when these States—four of which were members of the original thirteen—first became members of the Union.

Congress does not now demand that a single provision of their constitutions be changed, except such as confine suffrage to the white population. It is apparent, therefore, that these provisions do not conform to the standard of republicanism which Congress seeks to establish. That there be no mistake, it is only necessary that reference should be made to the original act, which declares—

"Such constitution shall provide that the elective franchise shall be enjoyed by all such persons as have the qualifications herein stated for electors of delegates."

What class of persons is here meant clearly appears in the same section. That is to say:

"The male citizens of said State, twenty-one years old and upward, of whatever race, color, or previous condition, who have been resident in said State for one year previous to the day of such election."

Without these provisions no constitution which can be framed in any one of the ten States will be of any avail with Congress. This, then, is the test of what the constitution of a State of this Union must contain to make it republican. Measured by such a standard, how few of the States now composing the Union have republican constitutions? If, in the exercise of the constitutional guarantee that Congress shall secure to every State a republican form of government, universal suffrage for blacks as well as whites is a sine qua non, the work of reconstruction may as well begin in Ohio as in Virginia, in Pennsylvania as in North Carolina.

When I contemplate the millions of our fellow-citizens of the South, with no alternative left but to impose upon themselves this fearful and untried experiment of complete negro enfranchisement and white disfranchisement, it may be almost as complete, or submit indefinitely to the rigor of martial law, without a single attribute of freemen, deprived of all the sacred guarantees of our Federal Constitution, and threatened with even worse wrongs, if any worse are possible, it seems to me their condition is the most deplorable to which any people can be reduced. It is true that they have been engaged in rebellion, and that their object being a separation of the States and a dissolution of the Union, there was an obligation resting upon every loyal citizen to treat them as enemies and to wage war against their cause.

Inflexibly opposed to any movement imperiling the integrity of the Government, I did not hesitate to urge the adoption of all measures necessary for the suppression of the insurrection. After a long and terrible struggle the efforts of the Government were triumphantly successful, and the people of the South, submitting to the stern arbitrament, yielded forever the issues of the contest. Hostilities terminated soon after it became my duty to assume the responsibilities of the Chief Executive officer of the Republic, and I at once endeavored to repress and control the passions which our civil strife had engendered, and, no longer regarding these erring millions as enemies, again acknowledged them as our friends and our countrymen. The war had accomplished its objects. The nation was saved, and that seminal principle of mischief which, from the birth of the Government, had gradually but inevitably brought on the rebellion was totally eradicated. Then, it seemed to me, was the auspicious time to commence the work of reconciliation; then, when the people sought once more our friendship and protection I considered it our duty generously to meet them in the spirit of charity and forgiveness, and to conquer them even more effectually by the magnanimity of the nation than by the force of its arms.

I yet believe that if the policy of reconciliation then inaugurated, and which contemplated an early restoration of these people to all their political rights, had received the support of Congress, every one of these ten States, and all their people, would at this moment be fast anchored in the Union, and the great work which gave the war all its sanction, and made it just and holy, would have been accomplished. Then, over all the vast and fruitful regions of the South peace and its blessings would have prevailed, while now millions are deprived of rights guaranteed by the Constitution to every citizen, and after nearly two years of legislation find themselves placed under an absolute military despotism. "A military Republic—a government formed on mock elections, and supported only by the sword," was nearly a quarter of a century since pronounced by Daniel Webster, when speaking of the South American States, as "a movement, indeed, but a retrograde and disastrous movement, from the regular and old-fashioned monarchical systems," and he added:

"If men would enjoy the blessings of republican government they must govern themselves by reason, by mutual counsel and consultation, by a sense and feeling of general interest, and by the acquiescence of the minority in the will of the majority, properly expressed; and, above all, the military must be kept, according to the language of our Bill of Rights, in strict subordination to the civil authority. Where ever this lesson is not both learned and practiced there can be no political freedom. Absurd, preposterous is it, a scoff and a satire on free forms of constitutional liberty, for forms of government to be prescribed by military leaders, and the right of suffrage to be exercised at the point of the sword."

I confidently believe that a time will come when these States will again occupy their true positions in the Union. The barriers which now seem so obstinate must yield to the force of an enlightened and just public opinion, and sooner or later unconstitutional and oppressive legislation will be effaced from our statute-books. When this shall have been consummated, I pray God that the errors of the past may be forgotten, and that once more we shall be a happy, united, and prosperous people, and that at last, after the bitter and eventful experience through which the nation has passed, we shall all come to know that our only safety is in the preservation of our Federal Constitution, and in every State the rights which that Constitution secures.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, March 23, 1867.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is now before the House, and the question is, Will the House, upon reconsideration, pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding? On this question the Constitution requires that the yeas and nays shall be taken.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 25, not voting 25; as follows:

Mr. LOGAN. My colleague, Mr. RAUM, is absent, by leave of the House, on account of sickness in his family. If he were present he would vote in the affirmative.

The roll-call having been concluded,

The SPEAKER pro tempore said: On this question the yeas are 114, the nays 25. Two thirds of this House having, on reconsideration, agreed to the passage of this bill, notwithstanding the objections of the President, the bill with the objections will be sent to the Senate, that the question of its reconsideration may be submitted, under the requirement of the Constitution, to that body.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its Clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 28) to grant to the American Atlantic Cable Telegraph Company of New York the right of way and privilege to lay, land, and operate a submarine telegraph cable on the Atlantic coast of the United States, and establish telegraphic communication between the United States and Europe via the Bermudas and Azores islands.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. JULIAN. On account of sickness of relatives at home I ask leave of absence for the remainder of the present session.

Leave was granted.

Mr. COBB. I also ask leave of absence for the remainder of the session.

Leave was granted.

RIGHTS OF VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement in regard to an incorrect print of an important law, which, if it goes uncorrected, may occasion serious misunderstanding. It will take me but a few moments to make the statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any objection to allowing the gentleman from Ohio to make a statement?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, by some rule of the Senate or House, or possibly by a concurrent resolution of both Houses—I do not know which—the laws passed from time to time are printed in the form of House or Senate documents, and are distributed by members for the information of their constituents. There have been laid upon our desks copies of a law approved the 2d day of March current, the last legislative day of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, entitled "An act declaring and fixing the rights of volunteers as a part of the Army." I observe that a very important mistake has occurred in printing this law. Five lines which are included in this printed copy are really no part of the law. The Senate, in amending the bill, which originated in this House, proposed to insert the following words, constituting the clause now erroneously embraced in this copy of the law:

And all officers in the Army of the United States, who have served by commission in the volunteer forces in the war for the suppression of the rebellion, shall have the same rank by brevet in the Army of the United States as the highest rank they held by commission in the volunteer forces, not including brevet commissions.

The House refused to concur in that amendment, regarding it as unconstitutional, on the ground that Congress cannot confer brevet rank upon any class of persons; that this power can be exercised only by the President with the concurrence of the Senate. The Senate receded from their amendment, in accordance with the recommendation of a committee of conference, whose report was presented on the last night of the session, the acting Speaker [Mr. SCHENCK] being one of the conferees on the part of the House. This clause, therefore, should not be printed as a part of the law; and any members who are sending away these printed copies are misleading their constituents.

Mr. UPSON. The gentleman will permit me to ask whether he has compared this copy with the text of the original act, on file in the office of the Secretary of State.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not done that; but I have compared it with the engrossed bill and with the report of the conference committee on file in the office of the Enrolling Clerk of the House, who assures me that this print has been made up by the Public Printer under the direction of the Senate, without an examination of the enrolled act in the office of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an inquiry in reference to this matter. I do not know whether this paper is an authoritative print of the law or not. If it has been printed under joint resolution of the two Houses, I take it that it would be recognized in any court as the law. But I do not know that it has been printed in pursuance of a joint resolution of Congress. At all events, we ought to do something to prevent this irregular and loose way of printing our laws.

I understand that this has not been printed from the rolls at the State Department, but from the Clerk's records in one of the Houses of Congress; and I make this statement so that it may go into the Globe, and thus notify members to correct the error before sending the document to their constituents. My attention was called to the subject by an Army friend who wished to know what the law is in reference to brevets. My own recollection was that these words had been stricken out, and on reference to the chairman of the committee of conference on the part of the House, and to the rolls of the Clerk's office, I became satisfied that this was a misprint. It is a serious blunder, and ought to be corrected.

Mr. BLAINE. The law which did pass actually gave the President the right to confer brevets, at his discretion, upon the regular officers who served in the volunteer service; and it has been published from the Secretary of State's office officially as the action of Congress. The War Department, as I understand, is now acting under that law.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am told by a friend near me that these documents printed by the House and Senate are really made up from the public newspapers as the acts are approved from day to day; which is certainly a loose and irregular way of giving laws to the country. I hope the proper committee will see to it that hereafter whatever is ordered to be printed and published officially as law shall be taken from the authentic records, and not from the daily papers.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. BLAINE. I rise to a privileged question. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That when the House adjourns on Tuesday next it be to meet on Monday, November 11, at twelve o'clock m.

Mr. BUTLER. Is that a privileged question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will let his resolution lie over until Monday next?

Mr. BLAINE. Let us have a vote on it to-day. I demand the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman will make it one week later.

Mr. BLAINE. It is now one week later than the autumn elections. I made it so purposely.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. BLAINE. I withdraw the previous question, and yield to the gentleman from Ohio for five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Is this a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is a privileged question, but not a question of privilege.

Mr. BLAINE. All I desire is to have a vote on the question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say before the vote is taken that there are now pending before the President of the United States several hundred important appointments of postmasters and other officers that should be acted upon before we adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. This does not provide for, but expressly excludes, the adjournment of the Senate. It contemplates the sitting of the Senate until those appointments have been disposed of.

Mr. GARFIELD. The President of the United States is said to be very anxious to get the Fortieth Congress away from Washington.

Mr. BROOKS. How do you know that?

Mr. GARFIELD. I take it that a gentleman who is so intimate with him as the gentleman from New York ought to know something about it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It seems that the gentleman from Ohio is more intimate with the President, and to have information that we have not.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course I have my information at second-hand.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand the President is very desirous to get the Fortieth Congress out of Washington, and if the House is allowed to adjourn so that there can be no legislation, he will be in less haste to make these appointments. But if the two Houses shall agree to this resolution he may at the very last hour send his appointments to the Senate and that body will be compelled either to reject them, and thus leave many important offices vacant, or to accept men to fill them who are not acceptable to the people. I hope that both Houses will sit here until these important appointments are made; and that, if need be, there will be rejections again and again until the wishes of the people have been complied with. When this is done we should adjourn and give the business of the country a little rest. I am anxious for an early adjournment, but I hope we shall first see that the vacancies now existing in the several Departments are properly filled. It is quite possible that we may be able to adjourn on the day named in the resolution. I hope we may; but I think it unwise for us to say so now, and thus put ourselves in the President's power. We have undertaken to protect the people against his policy; let us complete the work; and if on the morning of Tuesday next we find ourselves able to adjourn that day let us then say so, and go home.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLAINE. In one moment. I do not understand what Congress has to do with executive appointments. I do understand that it may be extremely necessary for the Senate to remain in session, and this resolution contemplates nothing else than that it may remain, if necessary, until next December in continuous session, or until the appointments are satisfactorily settled. But let me say that sitting here and passing general resolutions will do nothing but delay appointments. They will be made earlier if the House adjourn, in my opinion, than if we sit here.

Mr. BUTLER. Will my friend yield me ten minutes?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not yield ten minutes;

I do not want the debate to run that long. I will yield five minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well. Mr. Speaker, the Thirty-Ninth Congress by ordering this special session said to the people of the United States that Andrew Johnson is a bad man, and that this House and the Senate should sit here to take care of his acts. In obedience to that law we assembled here. He has just this moment sent us a veto of a bill arraigning the details of the act of reconstruction upon grounds of alleged unconstitutionality. And now it is proposed to go away and leave the whole matter of reconstruction in his hands for seven or eight months. You say by so doing that he can be trusted, that he is a good man to be trusted with this great question of reconstructing on empire; that this country is perfectly safe in his hands because you thus leave the whole case to him; for is he not Commander-in-Chief of the Army?

More than that, and beyond all, you have said to the country through your committee of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and through your action in this Congress, that there is reasonable ground to believe that Andrew Johnson ought to be impeached, and have put your committee on the inquiry. Now, there either is or is not reasonable ground to believe him impeachable. If there is, that question ought to be determined at once and forever. If there is not, that question ought to be determined at once and forever, and not left before the country as a disturbing element for eight months longer. Justice to him, justice to the business interests of the country, require that we should stay here like men and deal with this great question, and bring it to a finality, and not abandon the whole field to his occupation. Why, sir, we are thus acting like a general who, having begun a critical movement against the enemy, then abandons the whole field, going off on a frolic out of reach of the sound of the battle he has commenced. Let me say with all respect to the House, that the country, the loyal men of the country, the business interest of the country, will hold every member responsible who votes for this adjournment for the mischiefs which may happen to the business and government of the country from the maladministration of Andrew Johnson for the next eight months, with Congress made powerless by their votes. First, then, and last and all the time, I present my most earnest protest against this adjournment; and I have only to add that I thank my friend [Mr. BLAINE] for allowing me five minutes in which to do.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, the statement has gone so long unchallenged on the floor of this House that the great loyal party of this country are waiting anxiously for this branch to initiate a measure of impeachment that I think it is time it was contradicted. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] through what convention of the people, through what organism of public opinion, through what channel of general information anywhere throughout the length and breadth of the land, this demand is made upon Congress? Sir, I maintain that out of the seventeen or eighteen hundred newspapers that represent the loyal Union party of this country—and these are the best indices of public opinion which that party has—the gentleman cannot find twenty-five which regard the impeachment movement as one seriously to be undertaken on the part of Congress at this time; and when he talks about their waiting our action, and says that this question ought to be settled at once, let me tell him that in the public mind of the country this question is settled.

Mr. BUTLER. Which way?

Mr. BLAINE. It is settled upon any showing which has been had, as bad a man as Mr. Johnson may be and whatever he may have done, so far as the gentleman has yet brought his charges against him, that they do not believe it worth while to upturn the foundations of the Government by having the extraordinary spectacle of entering upon the impeachment at this time. I say there has been no manifestation anywhere of a design or a desire on the part of the loyal people, so far as I have the honor to represent them or know their feelings, to carry out a measure of impeachment at this time.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to say that within the last two weeks one of the largest meetings ever held in the interior of Pennsylvania was held in Schuylkill county, where resolutions were passed imperatively demanding the impeachment of Andrew Johnson?

Mr. BUTLER. And allow me to further state that I had the honor to argue before the Legislature of his own State the question whether Andrew Johnson ought to be impeached or not. In my judgment they would have voted for it at once, but I advised them to wait until action had been taken by Congress.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman may be better posted in regard to affairs and public opinion in the State of Maine than I am. I know he addressed a meeting there, and I suppose with his accustomed eloquence, and undoubtedly with great acceptance to the Legislature and the audience assembled there. But I undertake to say from what I know of those people, and they are right in the very heart of my district, that they regarded the course recommended by the gentleman as inexpedient.

Mr. BUTLER. And with the gentleman's permission I will further say that I have had the honor, under the rule, to file with the Clerk of the House petitions from many parts of the country, praying that Andrew Johnson may be impeached. And when the gentleman tells me that the newspapers of the country do not favor impeachment, let me ask him how many of the managers of those newspapers have brothers, sons, uncles, nephews, even aunts and cousins in the Federal offices of this Government?

Mr. BLAINE. If the gentleman wants to arraign the managers and editors of newspapers as a class I will take up the gauntlet. I say that a better or higher-toned class of men does not exist in the United States than those who represent the press. The gentleman, I understand, admits that I am correct in stating that of the seventeen or eighteen hundred Union newspapers in this country, not twenty-five of them have spoken in favor of his proposition for impeachment.

Mr. BUTLER. It is not my proposition, but the proposition of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, of which I was not a member.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I rise to a question of order. I desire to inquire of the Chair what the question of impeachment has to do with the question of adjourning from next Tuesday until November next.

Mr. BLAINE. Only because the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] says we should not adjourn until we have disposed of the question of impeachment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] will suspend his remarks, the Chair will reply to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. EGGLESTON.] The Chair has not interrupted this debate, because the proposition being to adjourn the House with the consent of the Senate until November next, the question is open in relation to all subjects requiring the attention of the House at this time.

Mr. EGGLESTON. And it is debatable to that extent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. EGGLESTON. Another question: does not this subject come under Rule 44 in relation to motions to adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is not a question of ordinary adjournment, and therefore does not come within the rule to which the gentleman refers. This is a resolution to fix the time at which the House shall again meet after the close of the present session.

Mr. LOAN. I ask that the Clerk read from pages 7 and 8 of Barclay's Digest in relation to adjournment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOAN] appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. LOAN. I do, for the purpose of having that read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A motion to adjourn, and a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, shall be always in order, and these motions shall be decided without debate." (Rule 44.) It has been decided and acted upon that the motion 'to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn' takes precedence of a motion 'to adjourn'; the reason being that, before the House adjourns, it is proper to fix the time to which it shall adjourn."

Mr. LOAN. That is sufficient. I now withdraw my appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that this proceeding is one coming more particularly under a clause of the Constitution, and not under the rules of the House relating to an ordinary adjournment or recess. There is a provision of the Constitution that Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday of December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day. If this resolution, therefore, related to the meeting of a different session of Congress, according to the requirements of the Constitution it could be effected only by the passage of a law. But this proceeding is under the last paragraph of the fifth section of the first article of the Constitution, which provides that—

"Neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting."

This is not an ordinary proposition to adjourn for three days or less, which does not require the concurrence of the Senate. It is a proposition that the House shall ask the Senate to consent to an adjournment of the House until next November, having no reference whatever to an adjournment of the Senate. This proposition, in the opinion of the Chair, opens up the general question as to the propriety of asking the Senate to consent to an adjournment for the length of time proposed.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have merely to say that I desire this question to be postponed till Monday or Tuesday next, when we can tell better than at present in what condition we stand with regard to the public business. There are three or perhaps four small appropriation bills, two of them I hold in my hand now, one of them has not yet reached me from the Senate, the passage of which is necessary in order that the business of the Government may be carried on after we adjourn. These bills relate to expenses of the House and the Senate and some matters connected with the public grounds; and I suppose all will admit that they ought to be passed before we agree to adjourn. In addition to this there are, I believe, several important bills now on the Speaker's table; and if this proposition for adjournment should be agreed to, there are but a few hours left in which to consider them. While I do not now urge the indefinite postponement of this question, I prefer that its consideration should be postponed until Tuesday next.

Now, as to the question of impeachment, I have but a word to say. I have heretofore said but very little on that subject. I believe, sir, that the people expected us to make a full examination, and if we found cause, to impeach Andrew Johnson. We have examined, and so far have reported that there is sufficient ground for suspicion and further examination. We also yesterday voted for an inquiry with regard to the impeachment of another important officer of the Government. Upon inquiry this morning I learn that the testimony in that case was not printed so as to be at the command of the committee. What they will see proper to do is a question which I cannot determine. If they report articles of impeachment, it does not follow that we stay here to try the accused; but it does follow that those articles ought of course to be filed with the Senate, so that they may fix the time for the trial.

Now, sir, I do not make any charge as to any gentleman's taking this mode to get rid of the impeachment. I understand that the gentleman from Maine thinks that nobody wants impeachment.

Mr. BLAINE. Nobody outside of Congress is now demanding it—

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I thought that everybody wanted it except a few gentlemen in Congress; and I thought everybody wanted it here until after the election of the Presiding Officer of the Senate. Since that time I know there has been a growing inclination in certain quarters not to have an impeachment, because it seems to be preferred that the present Executive should remain where he is to his being substituted by the present Presiding Officer of the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. I never heard that before.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman may never have heard it before; but I remember hearing him some time ago say here, (and therefore I may speak of it,) "There will be no impeachment by this Congress; we would rather have the President than the shallywags of BEN. WADE." [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Was not the conversation to which the gentleman alludes long before the election of the present Presiding Officer of the Senate?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; it was some days after. It was not a conversation; it was a declaration.

Mr. BLAINE. When the gentleman reports private conversations he must report them upon the veracity and memory of the respective participants; and with all due respect to the gentleman's great age—and I would certainly never be lacking in such respect—I must say that as he reports a private conversation—

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I had no private conversation; I was here in my place.

Mr. BLAINE. Then it was a conversation with somebody else which the gentleman overheard.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I heard the gentleman make the declaration.

Mr. BLAINE. It must have been either a private conversation with the gentleman or else a private conversation with somebody else which the gentleman overheard. It certainly was not a public utterance in debate.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It was not a conversation; it was a declaration publicly made.

Mr. BLAINE. On the floor of the House?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. In this House, on the floor of the House.

Mr. BLAINE. The Globe would show it if it was anything said in debate.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman was not debating—

Mr. BLAINE. I wish now to pin the gentleman on that. It was either a private conversation with the gentleman himself or with somebody else. On the occasion to which I suppose the gentleman refers, in discussing the question of the presidency of the Senate, Mr. WADE and a very distinguished Senator from my own State having been spoken of in the public newspapers as candidates for the position, I said something of this kind: that, taking into view the different characteristics of the two gentlemen, I thought that Mr. FESSENDEN would be a safer man to intrust with the executive power of the nation in certain contingencies than Mr. WADE. I certainly meant no disrespect whatever to Mr. WADE. I admire him for his boldness.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania forces me to repeat this in public, which I never designed to do. If the gentleman wishes to report here on the floor of the House any other private conversations which I may have had with him, or which he may have overheard me have with others, I shall take the liberty at all events to set myself right.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman must refer to a very different matter if he calls it a "conversation."

Mr. BLAINE. It is not in the Globe, therefore it must have been private.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I never should have referred to this if the gentleman had not brought it out by his remarks. I was not conversing with him. It was after the election in the Senate; and the gentleman, under considerable excitement, which he is not apt to get into—

Mr. BLAINE. I was perfectly cool.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman, under considerable excitement, said, "There will be no impeachment by this Congress;" and then added what I have already stated. The gentleman doubtless does not remember it, because he was at that time ardent in what he was saying. I merely mention this to show that there may be in the minds of some gentlemen other reasons why we should adjourn now than the mere question of the business of the country. I again repeat I do not wish to impugn the motives of any gentleman—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired, unless the gentleman from Maine yields to him longer.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not wish to limit the gentleman at all.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I am very much obliged to the gentleman; but I do not wish to trespass upon his courtesy.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be put in the attitude, in which the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would place me, of ever having said, either publicly or privately, anything in the least degree disrespectful to the gentleman who has now the honor to preside over the Senate of the United States. In the only conversation or conversations which I ever had touching the point to which the gentleman now refers, (and the gentleman does not pretend to say that the conversation was with himself, so he must have overheard me conversing with some other gentleman,) I was speaking of the relative characteristics of the two distinguished Senators who were spoken of for the position of President of the Senate; and I then said—

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to say that in the declaration which he made and to which I referred, the name of Mr. FESSENDEN was not mentioned.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman must have heard only a part of my declaration. Persons who overhear a conversation are very apt to get only a part of it, and the gentleman is no exception to the rule. I do not apply the offensive term "eavesdropper" to the gentleman, because that would impute to him what is inconsistent with his character; but at all events he overheard a conversation, and he only heard a part of it.

On the occasion to which I have referred, I was speaking of the relative characteristics of those two gentlemen, and I added that in case of impeachment—I say the same thing everywhere—in case of impeachment, the measure, in my judgment, would have more strength if Mr. FESSENDEN, rather than Mr. WADE, were to be the successor of the present Executive. In saying this, I say no more than if in a national convention of my party, I should say that I preferred Mr. FESSENDEN to Mr. WADE, as a presidential candidate. It implied and conveyed no more disrespect to Mr. WADE than that.

I certainly do not wish to comment any further on the gentleman's report of a private conversation. I propose now to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] whom, I am afraid, I have treated a little discourteously in not yielding to him sooner. I beg his pardon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had concurred in the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate to House joint resolution No. 25, to provide for the importation into the United States of certain works of art duty free.

It also informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (S. No. 88) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 21) in reference to the collection and payment of moneys due colored soldiers, sailors, and marines; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 24) relative to the payment of expenses incurred by the judges of elections for the cities of Washington and Georgetown, District of Columbia.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I wish to say a single word.

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I understand the gentleman to say, or rather to characterize what I stated, as overhearing a private conversation. I thought I had already stated to the House that it was no private conversation. The gentleman spoke out loud, so that everybody could hear him.

Mr. BLAINE. If I were speaking out loud so everybody could hear me it would have been in the Globe, and the gentleman does not pretend that it is in the Globe. If I were speaking at all it was in private conversation.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman was speaking generally; he was talking to no one in particular.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman himself particularly to one point. Although under ordinary circumstances it might be considered that I had strong provocation, still I will not be betrayed into saying anything disrespectful of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He must have observed that what he overheard was what occurred in private conversation. It may have been in a loud voice, but it certainly was not in public discussion.

He says that it was to the gentleman himself, or to other gentlemen. I have no recollection of having a conversation with the gentleman on the subject. He must have overheard me talking to others. And I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is not in accordance with the amenities of debate to thrust into any discussion upon this floor what was overheard in a private conversation.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It must have been heard upon the floor by other gentlemen.

Mr. BLAINE. I doubt whether any gentleman can get up and say that he heard it. The gentleman puts me in an awkward position. It puts me in the attitude of assailing in some way the distinguished Senator who now presides over the Senate of the United States, because he came into competition with the Senator from my own State and my valued personal friend. He comes here and repeats in public debate what he overheard in private conversation. If he is satisfied after I have had an opportunity to explain, I also am satisfied.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I again deny that there was any such private conversation, or that Mr. FESSENDEN's name was mentioned at all.

Mr. BLAINE. I was not speaking to the gentleman and was not addressing the House at the time of the alleged conversation.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. You were addressing the House.

Mr. BLAINE. The Globe shows nothing of the kind.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. You were ranging from one side to the other.

Mr. BLAINE. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I have almost lost the desire I had when I appealed to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to allow me to address an inquiry to him. I do not propose to take any part or lot in the expressions of kindness and generosity and sympathy which gentlemen have used toward each other on the other side of the House; but on this subject of adjournment I do feel some interest. I desire that this Congress should speedily adjourn. I think since we came together in the Fortieth Congress each day has made it more and more uncertain and difficult to know why we were called together or what good purpose was to be subserved thereby.

It is said there are a large number of offices yet to be filled by the President, and that the appointments have to go before the Senate for its action thereon. Whose fault is it that these offices are not filled? I understand that the President has furnished nominations of good, unobjectionable men without number, in some cases six or ten for one office one after the other, and that the Senate have rejected them on purely political grounds. I understand that gentlemen desired this Congress to assemble immediately after the preceding one because the President during the recess of the Thirty-Ninth Congress had made removals, in some cases for political reasons, and they desired to prevent such removals. Gentlemen propose to impeach the President now for making removals on political grounds, and yet propose to keep Congress in perpetual session in order that the Senate may reject the President's nominations on precisely the same grounds—difference in politics.

Mr. GARFIELD rose.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not yield at this moment, because I propose after a moment to propound a question to the gentleman in reference to some things which he asserted before. Now, I will not enter into the discussion of the question of loyalty. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] says all the loyal people of the country demand the impeachment of the President. But the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] alleges that all the people of the country pronounce the movement a consummate piece of folly.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman will allow me, I think he mistook my statement. I said the whole of the loyal people of the country demanded that this question of impeachment should be settled one way or the other.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Perhaps that was the remark of the gentleman, but it struck me at the same time that this word loyalty was becoming a very indefinite and uncertain term. I supposed I understood its meaning, and yet I thought of asking the gentlemen on the other side of the House what they meant by it in their controversy with each other. The Speaker of this House, when he was chosen as such of this Congress, made a distinction between loyalty and law, using the phrase liberty, loyalty, and law, and from that time I myself had some doubt as to what loyalty did mean in the opinions of the gentlemen on the other side. It is impossible for me to determine satisfactorily to myself what gentlemen do mean by it. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] claims to be loyal, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] claims to be loyal. Perhaps they feel very much like the man who lately was boasting of his loyalty and was asked how he felt. He said he felt loyal. "Well, what kind of a feeling is that," he was asked. "Why," said he, "I feel as though I wanted to kill somebody and steal something." [Laughter.] It seems to me since the President has occupied his present position to the party that elected him, since these gentlemen have out-grown him, they act as though they wanted to kill him and then steal a man into his place whom they can use for their own purposes.

And now a word to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] He made a statement a few moments ago that the President was anxious to get rid of this Congress, and he asserted that he had that information second-hand from gentlemen on this side of the House. Now, if the gentleman has that information, he has more on the subject than I have myself or am able to gain from any of the gentlemen around me; and, sir, I now ask him what gentleman on this side of the House has informed him that it was the President's desire to get rid of this Congress by its speedy adjournment?

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me a moment, I wish to correct a statement he made in reference to my remarks. I do not desire to be misunderstood. The gentleman said I desired Congress to remain in session for two purposes: first, to compel the appointment of certain persons to office; and secondly, for the purpose of impeaching the President. I call his attention to the fact that I made no allusion whatever to the question of impeachment. That subject has been referred to a committee for examination and report. I have nothing to say in that direction until we hear from the committee.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not think my remark was personal to the gentleman in that regard; but the gentleman did say that the President desired to get rid of this Congress, and he had it second-handed from gentlemen on this side of the House who were better informed than he. I demand of him to know, if he will tell us, from what gentleman on this side he gets that information, for I do not believe he has it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to know if the gentleman declares that he does not believe I have heard what I say I have heard?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. No, sir; not in that sense.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well, that ends his colloquy with me.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not wish to make any charge. I simply say that if the gentleman has information on that subject, I do not think he has it from any authorized source. I make no reflection upon the gentleman.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am glad the gentleman does not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I have never, like the gentleman, heaped insulting epithets upon gentlemen on the other side of the House with whom I differ politically.

Mr. GARFIELD. As the gentleman has made an explanation that is satisfactory, I beg to say that I have heaped no epithets on that side of the House. I expressed it as my opinion merely that the President of the United States would be very glad to have the Fortieth Congress adjourn, and some gentleman on the other side asked me how I knew it, and I said simply that I understood it from the friends of the President himself. I understand it as I understand it is daylight when the sun shines, or that it is dark in the night; as every man understands the current opinions of the people on any question. I do not suppose that anybody here denies that it is uncomfortable in many respects for the President of the United States that Congress is here. That is all I meant and all I now mean. There is no cause of misunderstanding.

Now, one word more, and I shall have done. I simply desire to say that it was purely on the ground of legislative and executive business that I raised my objection to agreeing now to adjourn on Tuesday next. I alleged then, as I allege now, that there are many important appointments that have been hanging over and have been delayed for a long time; and if we now agree to adjourn this House at some specific time near at hand and leave no pressure upon the Senate or the President, I can very easily foresee that all these appointments will be crowded in at the last moment, and we shall be compelled either to have the offices vacant or accept persons to fill them who are not acceptable to our constituents.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to inquire again of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] whether he now repeats the assertion which he made when upon the floor before, that the President of the United States is anxious to get rid of the presence of this Congress, that the gentleman has that information second-hand, and that he obtained it from gentlemen upon this side of the House? Or does he mean to be now understood that he has that information, to use his own language as nearly as I can repeat it, "as he knows it is day when the sun shines, or that it is night when it is dark," by seeing or not being able to see?

Mr. GARFIELD. I take it that is information enough. I meant simply that.

Now, I desire to say that before this Congress adjourns I think it ought to provide for a class of cases which were neglected at the last session. On the last day of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, when the Senate rejected a large number of nominations for Federal offices, officers of the revenue and the Post Office Department, it became necessary under the law that many of those offices should be closed. But there are now many persons holding office in direct violation of the provisions of that law. Now, it seems to me that unless appointments to those offices are very soon made and confirmed, it is our duty to provide what shall be done in those cases.

For instance, near the close of the last session of Congress a man was nominated for one of the most important post offices in my district, and he was rejected by the Senate; yet for the last nineteen days I am told that he has been holding that office and exercising all its functions, which is in direct and positive violation of the tenure-of-office act. There was no provision in that law under which any deputy or other person should perform the duties of a post office pro tempore. We should at once provide for such a contingency. Certain it is that we should not allow this continual violation of the law, and if necessary we should provide a better law for the case.

Mr. BLAINE. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I think we ought to determine now whether we will have a continued business session or adjourn. We have not been in session three weeks; but few committees have been appointed, and those only in pursuance of special resolutions directing their appointment. We have all felt that we were very soon going to adjourn, and I suppose most of the members, like myself, have made their arrangements to go home very soon.

But when a proposition is offered to fix the time for adjournment, one gentleman gets up and says that there is a little appropriation bill which ought to be passed. I thought we had almost beggared the Treasury by the appropriations which we made at the last session. Another gentleman has some appointment which he wants to have made and confirmed by the Senate before we adjourn. Now, I thought we had long ago run out this administration of all acceptable appointments which we were likely to get, and some other gentleman has some other little bill he wants passed before we adjourn, and so one excuse after another is made to detain us here without our regular committees, and constantly on the eve of an adjournment.

Now, I am willing to remain here all summer if there is any necessity for our being retained here; but if that is to be done, I want to have it so declared; I want to have our committees appointed, and have what legislation we do go through its regular and legitimate course. I do not want to be detained here by a kind of—I was about to say chicanery; I do not want to be detained here upon what may be termed false pretenses. I know it is not necessary for Congress to remain here for the purpose of passing some little appropriation bills, after we passed so many large ones at the last session. If any appropriation bills are necessary let your Committee on Appropriations be appointed. Your rules require that that committee shall report the appropriation bills within thirty days after they are appointed, and not to wait until the close of the session or the beginning of another session before they do so.

I know that it is not necessary for us to stay here to see about the appointment of a postmaster or anything of that kind. But if we are going to impeach the President, then it is necessary. If such a proceeding is to take place, then let the gentlemen who are in favor of impeachment bring forward that measure, and let the House determine upon it. Why has it not been done within the last three weeks? The question has been referred to a committee who have been authorized to sit during the summer and report to us next fall; and this course has been taken with the sanction of the very gentlemen who talk now of detaining us here for the sake of prosecuting an impeachment. While I wish to express no opinion upon the question of impeachment until I hear the evidence; while I hope to show as much courage, if courage is needed, upon that question as any of the most radical gentlemen with whom I act, still I am opposed to staying here to be trifled with. I do not wish to be kept here from day to day, under the pretense that there is some little appointment or some little bill that ought to be attended to, while the real purpose is ultimately to bring forward this measure. Let the measure be brought forward if it is to come. Why, sir, when can we have it presented? Not within a month, I suppose; probably not within two months. If we are not to have it, why not adjourn? And if we are going to adjourn at all, we shall be just as nearly ready next Tuesday as we ever shall be. Every day that we remain here some member thinks of another little appropriation bill or another little appointment or another little claim; and propositions are being piled upon the table to be sent to committees when they shall be appointed. Now, sir, let us determine this question one way or another. For my own part I am going to vote for adjournment just because the gentlemen who are opposing it have brought forward nothing for us to act upon.

Mr. BLAINE. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] five minutes.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, my wish is that the gentleman from Maine would withdraw his resolution until perhaps Tuesday or Wednesday of next week. I am clear in my own mind as to the reasons which should control this House as one branch of the Government in acting on this question. The great and substantial reason is that whether this House shall proceed to impeach the President or not, the majority of the people of this country, South and North, black and white, loyal and rebel, have pretty generally lost confidence in him.

Mr. BLAINE. That is true.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Whether this loss of confidence be based upon facts in his character or measures of his public policy, or upon suspicion or prejudice merely, I do not propose now to inquire. The great fact is that the people of the country everywhere have lost confidence in the wisdom, if not in the honesty, of his Administration.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman will allow me to inquire whether he thinks that our staying here will restore confidence in the President?

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir; but I think that the people of this country look to Congress as the only shield which can possibly avert from them evils which they apprehend, but which they do not plainly discover or understand.

I think the gentleman from Maine ought to withdraw his resolution until those in this House upon whom the responsibility rests as to the conduct of public affairs, as far as they are within the control of this branch of the Legislature, have had an opportunity to consider the subject. It is certainly of grave import to the country whether this Congress adjourns to November or chooses to take a recess for a shorter period of time. For myself, in view of the danger to the country of adjourning until October or November or December next, without power being vested anywhere except in the President of the United States, I do declare that I cannot hold myself excused if I consent to the resolution before the House. I am content as far as I can see what is before us, if an arrangement can be made for an adjournment of sixty or ninety days; but with my views of the responsibility resting on the House, it seems to me unwise to adjourn for a longer period of time.

I ask the gentleman from Maine to give us an opportunity to consider what shall be done in reference to the measures now pending. An inquiry has been ordered looking to the impeachment of the collector of the port of New York. That officer, in a financial point of view, is the second or third officer of the country, having the custody of immense funds, being the avenue through which we gather in means of paying the interest on the public debt, and thereby of protecting our national credit. He is clothed with great financial power for the benefit or injury of the country. That officer is charged, upon testimony taken by a committee of this House, and, as they say, upon his own confession, of being guilty of corrupt conduct, which, under the Constitution, makes him amenable as an officer of this Government to impeachment and trial for high crimes and misdemeanors. With that statement before the House, and the testimony not yet printed, a proposition is made to leave this Government, with all its political institutions and ten States or one third of the territory of the Republic, subject entirely in the matter of reconstruction to the control of one man in whom we have not confidence. It is proposed also to leave the great financial place of honor and trust in the hands of a person charged before the House and country, and upon his own admissions as it is stated, with being guilty of corruption in office.

One word in regard to the matter of impeachment. The gentleman from Maine intimates that the country has been already advised that there is nothing serious in this proceeding. Sir, I do not stand here to disclose anything I have learned in committee, or to refer to it, but I declare for myself, as one member of the committee, that nothing would be more serious in the performance of a public duty than my assent to a solemn resolution of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, that the President of the United States, on the testimony, was so far connected with transactions of an improper character, that it was the duty of the Fortieth Congress to proceed with the investigation. For myself I speak as well as for the committee, when I state that we are now proceeding earnestly, seriously, and deliberately in the investigation with which we are charged. Whether the people or the newspapers are for impeachment or against it need not now be made matters of inquiry. The investigation is prosecuted for the purpose and for the sole purpose of ascertaining whether the President is guilty of impeachable offenses or not. If he be so found guilty, the committee will report the fact and the evidence to the House; and if he be found not guilty, with equal courage and more satisfaction, the committee will report to the House and the country that he is not guilty, believing that the people and the newspapers will alike sustain the committee.

Mr. BLAINE. I yield now to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It seems to me,

Mr. Speaker, this matter is presented to the House in such a manner that members are to take the choice between an adjournment until next fall and continuing in perpetual session. If I am to choose between those two alternatives I shall vote to adjourn until fall. It is suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that there is no such question presented. I cannot see it in any other form. Here is a resolution proposing to adjourn till November. It is opposed because it is said to be necessary for us to remain and dangerous for us to go away. No plan is proposed by which we may adjourn over to an early day, and from that to some other day, and thus hold the session in our hands. Every person can see that it is simply a question as to whether we are to remain here continuously or take an adjournment till the coming fall.

Now, sir, when the gentleman from Massachusetts speaks of the danger to the country of our going away, I beg leave to say that so far as the business, the commercial interests of the country are concerned, there is greater danger to be apprehended from our remaining here in the condition we now are than in our taking an adjournment till fall. Every person connected with the business and commercial interest of the country is kept in a constant state of uncertainty and inquietude. No man knows at what time some measure may be launched into this House which is going to effect the general business of the country disastrously or otherwise. Everything is unsettled.

Now, sir, in regard to the matter of impeachment to which my colleague on the committee [Mr. BOUTWELL] has spoken, I will say this, as confirmatory of what he said: that the committee has been diligently pursuing that subject, but he knows and I know and every member of the committee knows that we can devote but a small portion of our time to this investigation while this House is in session.

Mr. BUTLER. Why not?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Why not? Because we are sent here by our constituents to look after their interests. Our place is in this House. We are interested in every measure that is introduced, and our constituents are interested in every measure. It is my duty to be here in my seat when the House is in session that I may guard the interests I am sent here to protect. That being the case, there is comparatively a small portion of the time that we can devote to this investigation. If there should be an adjournment the committee will then have ample time to give the subject a thorough investigation, and I do not know of any member of the committee who has any desire to act otherwise than as the House has directed, to investigate, and thoroughly investigate, that subject. But I do not wish to keep everything in this state of uncertainty for the purpose of holding the President in check. The committee must have time to make the investigation.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to state that I have been appealed to by gentlemen on the other side to let this go over. There is no prejudice one way or the other, because this is a privileged question. I therefore demand the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I suggest an amendment: to strike out November and insert the second Monday in May.

Mr. BLAINE. I shall not yield. I shall take the sense of the House on the resolution as it stands.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I then move to lay the resolution on the table, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.
Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the House adjourn.

On the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 42, noes 62.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was taken: and it was decided

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. BENJAMIN, to lay the resolution upon the table; upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 77, not voting 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Benjamin, Boutwell, Butler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Driggs, Eckley, Ela, Farnsworth, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Hamilton, Hooper, Ingersoll, Judd, Kelley, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, McClurg, Miller, Morrill, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Pile, Polsley, Schenck, Shanks, Shellabarger, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffey, Taylor, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Lawrence, Lynch, McCullough, Moorhead, Morgan, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Selye, Sitgreaves, Aaron F. Stevens, Stone, William B. Washburn, and Wood—34.

So the motion to lay the resolution on the table was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. INGERSOLL (at five minutes past four o'clock p. m.) moved that the House adjourn. The question was taken; and upon a division there were—yeas 37, noes 55.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. INGERSOLL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 72, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Benjamin, Benton, Boutwell, Butler, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Ela, Farnsworth, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Hamilton, Hooper, Hulburt, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Kelley, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, McClurg, Mercier, Miller, Morrill, Myers, Orth, Pile, Polsley, Schenck, Shanks, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Lawrence, Lynch, McCullough, Moorhead, Morgan, O'Neill, Paine, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Raum, Sawyer, Selye, Sitgreaves, Stone, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, and Wood—37.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to withdraw his call for the previous question until I can make a suggestion to the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to the call for the previous question being withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine has the right to withdraw the call before it is seconded.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I will renew the call.

Mr. BLAINE. How soon?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. In five minutes.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not desire to take up more of the time of the House in discussing this matter. I will withdraw the call, however, for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] to make a statement, but for no other purpose.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order. After the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has called the previous question and taken his seat he has no longer any right to the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine has a right to withdraw his call for the previous question at any time before it has been seconded.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The time of the gentleman had expired under the hour rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine introduced a privileged resolution, and under the rule was entitled to an hour to open the debate upon it. He yielded from time to time to other gentlemen, and when the hour had expired the Chair announced the fact. Had any other gentleman then claimed the floor, as the Chair supposed some one would do, he would have been recognized by the Chair and been entitled to the floor for an hour. But no other gentleman claiming the floor, the gentleman from Maine again obtained the floor and called the previous question. He now proposes to withdraw that call, which he has a right to do, the call not having yet been seconded.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I make a further point of order. The gentleman from Maine did not withdraw the motion for the previous question unconditionally; he simply proposed to withdraw it to give five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio. It is to that I object. He does not propose to yield unconditionally so that other gentlemen may have the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from Maine has the right to withdraw the call for the previous question unconditionally, and yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio; but he cannot impose a condition, if the condition is objected to. Objection being made, the gentleman cannot yield unless he relinquishes his right to the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I do not yield. I trust I shall not be accused of discourtesy to the gentleman from Ohio. I was willing to yield to him conditionally, but other gentlemen object. I must therefore insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BLAINE. I can do so only by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I hope that the demand for the previous question will not be sustained.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—yeas 55, noes 55.

Mr. BOYER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BLAINE and SHELLABARGER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 63, noes 54.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. WARD. I rise to a point of order. I submit that a proposition to fix a day to which the House shall adjourn takes precedence of a mere motion to adjourn; and therefore the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] cannot be acted on till the other question has been decided.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WARD. The Chair will allow me a single remark. As I understand the pending resolution, it proposes to fix the 11th day of November as the time to which the House shall adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule to which the gentleman refers relates to a simple resolution or motion to adjourn for three days or less, the decision of which is entirely within the control of the House. This, however, being a concurrent resolution proposing that the House, with the assent of the Senate, shall adjourn until next November, it does not come within the rule to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 64, nays 62, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Benjamin, Benton, Boutwell, Butler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Ela, Farnsworth, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Hamilton, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hunter, Judd, Kelley, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, McClurg, Mercier, Miller, Morrill, Myers, Newcomb, Orth, Peters, Pile, Polsley, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Taffey, Taylor, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, and Windom—64.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnes, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Chanler, Churchill, Cornell, Dodge, Eggleston, Eldridge, Ferriss, Ferry, Fox, Getz, Haight, Halsey, Hayes, Hill, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Julian, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koonz, Laffin, Lincoln, Loughridge, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, Moore, Morrissey, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Paine, Perham, Poland, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Ross, Smith, Spalding, Stewart, Taber, Thomas, Twitchell, Van Auker, Van Trump, Ward, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Woodbridge—62.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, James M. Ashley, Bingham, Broomwell, Broomall, Cake, Reader W. Clarke, Dawes, Denison, Eliot, Glessbrenner, Griswold, Harding, Holman, Hopkins, Ingersoll, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, McCullough, Moorhead, Morgan, O'Neill, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Raum, Sawyer, Selye, Sitgreaves, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wood—38.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITION.

The following petition was presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committee:

By Mr. CAKE: A petition of workmen of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, who are out of employment because of the prostration of the industrial interests of the nation, praying Congress to take early action upon the tariff question.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

The following notice for leave to introduce a bill was given under the rule:

By Mr. KERR: A bill to authorize and require the administration of oaths in certain cases and to punish perjury, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHANDLER presented resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of an appropriation for fortifying the island of Mackinac, in the Straits of Michilimackinac and the Sant Ste. Marie, at the falls of St. Mary's, and to establish a gunboat station in connection therewith; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of a pension of eight dollars per month to the survivors of soldiers in the war of 1812, and the widows of those who are dead, from April 1, 1865; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of an appropriation for the construction of a harbor at the mouth of the Ontonagon river; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of Nathaniel Bragdon, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Peter V. Poland, late of company F, ninth Tennessee cavalry, praying for compensation for the loss of two houses burnt by United States troops under the command of General Sheridan in March, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to present the petition of three hundred and fifty citizens of Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, praying for such an adjustment of the tariff on imports as will give protection to American manufactures and industry. These gentlemen say that they represent over twenty thousand people in that immediate neighborhood, and they think Congress would be better engaged for a part of the summer in adjusting some system of protection to American industry than by adjourning and going home. They desire me to say that they think members of Congress are now paid a liberal salary, and in their opinion had better remain here. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the memorial of Alexander J. Atocha, praying for the payment of his claim against Mexico, agreeably to the provisions of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of February 2, 1848; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NYE. I ask leave to present a preamble and resolutions of the Union League of the State of Maryland, which I desire to have read, and then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas the constitution of the State of Maryland carefully prescribes the qualification of voters, and makes a uniform registration of voters obligatory; and whereas the law passed in obedience to this mandate of the constitution has been made a nullity by the Governor, and the registers whom he appointed for that purpose, and the ballot-box opened for the reception of the votes of traitors, whereby a Legislature and other officers were elected notorious for their disloyalty; and whereas, carrying out the purposes of the Governor, and of their elections, this Legislature has annulled the loyal provisions of the constitution and restored to citizenship all who had abjured or forfeited their rights as citizens by treason against the State and the United States; and, on the other hand, has enacted a law making it treason for loyal men to unite to uphold the national Government; has not only refused to pass laws for the protection of colored citizens, but has offered a premium for violations of the laws of Congress, known as "The Freedmen's Bureau law, and the civil rights law" and assumed the defense of all who have violated those laws in the past, or will do so in the future, and made their defense a charge upon the State treasury without limit; has pensioned from the State treasury the Legislature which was suspended from the exercise of its functions by the military power of the nation, and compelled the city of Baltimore, in like manner, to pension the disloyal police force which was discharged from service in 1861 as a necessary measure of public safety; has instituted measures for imposing upon the State the burden of paying for the slaves emancipated as a necessary result of the slaveholders' rebellion, and has passed a law, in palpable and confessed violation of the constitution, calling a convention for the purpose of abrogating what remains of loyalty and equal rights in our constitution, and of placing loyal men in hopeless subjection to traitors: Therefore,

Resolved by the Grand Council of the Union League of Maryland, That we earnestly pray the Congress of the United States, as far as practicable, to extend to Maryland the principles of the military reconstruction law, and to secure to all loyal citizens in the State the right of suffrage.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution be signed by the Grand President and Secretary, and forwarded to Hon. FRANCIS THOMAS and Hon. JAMES W. NYE, with the request that they will lay the same before the House of Representatives and Senate respectively, and urge such action as shall insure protection to the loyal citizens of Maryland.

True copy by order:

A. STOCKBRIDGE, Grand President.

CHARLES H. GATCH, Grand Secretary.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask leave to withdraw the papers in the case of the heirs of John E. Bouligny. They are apprehensive that they may be lost, as some of the papers have been lost heretofore. If there be no objection, I ask to withdraw them from the files.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask that the petition of Clara Moore, widow of Ely Moore, deceased, praying payment to her of the claim of her husband for amount paid for additional clerks and office accommodations for those clerks in the register's office at Lecompton, Douglas county, Kansas, be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Public Lands. The committee were unable to report at the last session, and I want the papers re-committed.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, it was Ordered, That Ceran St. Vrain have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition for himself and the heirs of Ignacio Vigil, praying for the confirmation of a private land claim in New Mexico.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was Ordered, That the petition of Sarah L. Spring and Harriet Spring, praying that they may be allowed the pension due William Barker; also that they may be allowed the half pay to which he was entitled under resolution of Congress of October 21, 1780, granting half pay to the surviving officers of the Revolution, be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Minerva Lewis, administratrix of the estate of Ezekiel Lewis, deceased, praying for compensation for the steamboat Admiral, taken possession of by the United States authorities in the spring of 1862, used by them as an ordnance boat, and burned at Columbus, Kentucky, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That the petition of George H. Wells, praying for compensation for the steamboat Southern Merchant, taken by the rebels in May, 1861, captured by the United States gunboat Diana in December, 1862, taken to New Orleans, and condemned by the United States district court, and sold as a prize November 9, 1863, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to enter a privileged motion. I move that a communication be sent to the House of Representatives asking the House to return the resolution fixing the time of adjournment, with a view of moving a reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered, no objection being made.

Mr. TRUMBULL subsequently said: I understand that an order has passed here without any consideration to bring back from the House of Representatives the resolution of adjournment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order has just been made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to any such order.

Mr. SUMNER. There was no objection at the time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly there would have been objection if it had been understood. What is the object of bringing it back here?

Mr. SUMNER. We want to reconsider it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Perhaps the Senator from Massachusetts does; but I do not. If any such order has been made, I move to reconsider the vote by which it was done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose if the Senator did not understand what was going on—

Mr. CONNESS. There were no Senators here who understood the matter at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not hear it. I did not know such a motion was made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I understand now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Very well; it will be considered an open question. The question will be taken again on that motion.

Mr. WILSON. The motion is that the House of Representatives be requested to return the resolution of adjournment.

Mr. CONNESS. Upon that I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON. It is a motion which I suppose I have a right to make, and I am in favor of doing it. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider. I did not suppose that the resolution would go to the House until we had time to look at it this morning. I desire to have it called back for the purpose of making that motion, and on that I think it will be time enough to raise the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to know if the Senator proposes to put off the day of adjournment?

Mr. WILSON. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider for the purpose of changing the time to which we are to adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON. We can settle the question at once now.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask leave to present a joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This question must first be disposed of.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand there is no question before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is. Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Massachusetts simply asked to enter a motion, which he has a right to do.

Mr. CONNESS. I voted in the majority, and I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The pending question is on the motion to recall the resolution.

Mr. CONNESS. Has there been a motion to send for the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the pending question.

Mr. CONNESS. Then upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to have this resolution brought back here. It has gone to the House, and I was rather surprised to learn that fact. I desire to bring it back for the purpose of entering a motion to reconsider it, to see if we cannot fix a day on which Congress can come together, if it be necessary to do so, between now and December. I am satisfied that we ought to do that, and that it would be safer for the country if it should be done.

Mr. CHANDLER. As I understand it, there is no question before the Senate. The resolution has gone to the other House. The Senator from Massachusetts desires to enter a motion to have that resolution recalled in order that he may make a motion to reconsider. It is customary to make a motion of that kind where a bill or resolution has gone from the Senate. The question cannot be taken now, as I understand it, because the resolution is not before the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to request the House of Representatives to return the resolution in order that a motion to reconsider may be made. That is a motion, like every other, before the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish simply to say that it is not probable that I shall vote for the motion to reconsider, although I cannot say; I may hear good reasons to change my opinion. But it is very well known that there are in the Senate a certain number of days allowed within which a motion may be made to reconsider, and when a Senator rose who voted with the majority and said he wished to move to reconsider, and the bill had gone before the time expired, I have never known a case where a request to recall the matter to enable the motion to be made has been refused to him. I think it has always been as a matter of course acceded to where any Senator desired to move a reconsideration, if the matter had gone out of the possession of the Senate. I shall therefore vote in favor of requesting the return of the resolution if the Senator wishes to reconsider it.

Mr. SUMNER. I will add one remark to what the Senator from Maine has said: that unless we do recall a bill or a resolution like this on the suggestion of a Senator, the rule authorizing a motion to reconsider within two days may be avoided.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Exactly so.

Mr. SUMNER. It may be treated as nothing. Now, I think we ought to stand by our rules; those are established with a view to the public interests and to the conduct of public business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We spent several hours on Saturday on this resolution, and had several votes upon it. I think the sense of the Senate was pretty clearly manifested. There was some opposition to adjourning. The proposition upon which the Senator from Massachusetts now speaks was submitted to the Senate and voted upon directly, to meet at some intermediate time. I think the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] presented it. As the Senator has stated what his object is, it seems to me we might get at this more directly on the present motion. If the resolution is sent for, there can be no object in having it here and taking up time with it unless a majority of the Senate think we had better alter the resolution, and I thought we might have tested that question on this motion. However, the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Massachusetts seem to think differently, and that this is a motion to be made as a matter of course. If that is the understanding of the Senate, then any one can make the motion, and there ought to be no objection to it. I supposed it would be just as well to settle the whole question on this motion as it would be to recall the resolution. I am not particular about it, however. I am in favor of the adjournment of Congress. I think nothing will be made by bringing the resolution back here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The difference is, that unless it is before the Senate you cannot with any propriety, within the rules of order, debate the question. I merely speak in reference to what has always been the practice.

Mr. CONNESS. The practice has often been violated in that regard.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I never knew it done in my life.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the House of Representatives be requested to return the resolution named by him.

Mr. COLE. I hope the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts will prevail, and that the resolution will be brought back to the Senate for further consideration. I am now, as I was before, very much opposed to adjourning over for eight or nine months without leaving it in the power of Congress to meet in the mean time at all. It seems to me we should be repeating the same condition of things that we underwent in 1865, during the eight or nine months that elapsed between the accession of the present Executive to the Presidency and the meeting of Congress in December. I am in favor of adjourning early, and believe that if it is within our power to meet during the summer once or more, no necessity will arise for meeting during the summer; but I very much apprehend that if we adjourn over till December we shall have repeated what occurred two years ago, and it will result in establishing more firmly the policy to which we have been dissenting ever since, and which we do not wish to see established in this country. I earnestly hope that the resolution will be recalled from the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas and nays have been demanded.

Mr. CONNESS. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The motion of Mr. WILSON was agreed to.

SURVEYS OF RIVERS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of War, to report a joint resolution, on which I will ask the present action of the Senate, if there be no objection.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 48) in relation to the execution of surveys of rivers ordered by Congress, was read twice and considered as in the Committee of the Whole. It provides that the chief of Engineers may, with the approval of the Secretary of War, employ such civil engineers, not exceeding five in number, for the purpose of executing surveys and improvements of western and northwestern rivers, ordered by Congress, as may be necessary to the proper and diligent prosecution of the same; and the persons so employed may be allowed a reasonable compensation for their services, not to exceed the sum of $3,000 per annum.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROCEEDS OF CAPTURED PROPERTY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 19) directing that certain moneys now in the hands of the United States Treasurer, as special agent of the Treasury Department, be covered by warrant into the United States Treasury, with a recommendation that it be postponed until the first Monday in December next. The committee have directed me to make a verbal statement with regard to this resolution. We have examined it very carefully. The resolution recites that—

There is now in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States, as special agent of the Treasury Department, several million dollars, the proceeds of property captured during the rebellion, which money is under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, and as it now stands may be disposed of in settling claims preferred by the alleged former owners of said captured property without the sanction of Congress.

By an official report, which was only printed this morning, sent to both Houses of Congress on the 2d of March, 1867, I find that the House of Representatives acted on this matter under a misapprehension of the facts. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his statement, says that the whole amount of captured and abandoned property was $34,052,809 54, of which amount the sum of $24,742,022 55 remains as net proceeds, the balance being paid for transportation and other expenses of managing this fund. Each of the Secretaries of the Treasury, three of them in the last few years, has, under the existing laws, released certain property that was improperly taken or improperly held by the United States authorities. The amount so released was about a million dollars, or something over that, a full statement of which is given in this document. All of this money has been passed into the Treasury except $700,000; and as to that I will read this statement, which will probably relieve the members of the House from their anxiety as to the money:

"The claims examined and decided have been numerous and complicated. The papers and evidence in the same are voluminous, and cannot be readily incorporated into a general statement; but the same are of record in the Department, and, in any case which the Senate desire specially to investigate, will be submitted for examination.

"All moneys realized from the sales of property received under the act in question, and other similar acts, are not repaid to claimants as set forth in statements A and B, or disbursed as expenses of collecting and disposing of the same as provided by law, have passed into the hands of the Treasurer of the United States, and have also been regularly covered into the Treasury as receipts from captured and abandoned property, except the sum of $500,000 now on deposit with the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company of New York to secure the sureties on a bond required to be given by Simeon Draper, late cotton agent at New York, in a suit against him, and now pending in New York, instituted by the firm of Dennistoun & Co., to recover the proceeds of alleged blockade cotton, taken by agents of the Government and shipped to Mr. Draper for sale; and except, also, about seven hundred thousand dollars, which remains uncovered, for the payment of expenses incident to the collection, care, and disposition of such property, as provided by law; to defray the expenses of certain suits for the recovery of such property or its proceeds, now being prosecuted abroad; to satisfy any judgments which may be obtained against any agents of the Department in suits instituted against them for acts done in an official capacity concerning such property; and also to await the final settlement of certain specific claims pending for the proceeds of property alleged to have been wrongfully taken, which the Department may properly adjudicate."

It seems, then, that the "several million dollars" spoken of in the preamble to this joint resolution have already been transferred to the Treasury, or what is called "covered" into the Treasury, excepting the sum of $500,000 held to await the decision of the Supreme Court, and also the sum of $700,000, which remains uncovered to defray the expenses of collection of such property and also to satisfy such judgments of the Court of Claims as may be made. I have also a statement from two of the judges of the Court of Claims that there are cases pending before that court involving a portion of this sum, and that they are proceeding to examine them as rapidly as possible. Under this state of the case the apprehensions of the House seem to be unfounded, and the committee were unanimously of the opinion that the subject-matter had better be postponed until the next session. There is no objection to "covering" all the $700,000 not needed to pay the expenses and to provide for the claims passed upon by the Court of Claims; but as it will be difficult to make the exceptions now carefully, the committee thought there was a propriety in postponing the matter until the first Monday of December next; and I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

THE PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 28) to increase the force in the Patent Office, and for other purposes, to report it with an amendment to strike out all after the first section; and as it must be acted upon to-day in order to be effective, I ask that it be considered now. It will take but a moment. It is simply to increase the number of examiners.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. The first section of the bill authorizes the Commissioner of Patents from time to time to appoint, in the manner already provided for by law, such an additional number of principal examiners, first assistant examiners, and second assistant examiners as may be required to transact the current business of the office with dispatch; but the whole number of such additional examiners is not to exceed four of each class, and the total annual expense of the Patent Office is not to exceed its annual receipts.

The Committee on Finance reported an amendment, to strike out the second and third sections of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Patents is authorized to appoint, by and with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, a solicitor of the Patent Office, who shall be considered its law officer, whose salary shall be $3,000 per annum, to be paid from the patent fund, and whose duty it shall be to render all reasonable aid in the transaction of the business of said office that may be required of him by the said Commissioner.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the salary of the first assistant examiners and disbursing clerk shall be $2,000, and the salary of the librarian shall be $2,500, which shall be in full for his services as translator and librarian.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire what committee that comes from?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me to be a patent matter entirely.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senator that it ought to have been referred, in my judgment, to the Committee on Patents, but it was referred at a late hour of the session on Saturday to the Committee on Finance, and we were bound to consider it. We had before us the Commissioner of Patents, who represented the necessity of an increased force, and satisfied us entirely that an increased force was necessary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know whether it has the sanction of the Committee on Patents and been examined by them.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was not referred to that committee, but I conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Patents. It ought to have been referred to that committee.

Mr. WILLEY. When this bill was referred to the Committee on Finance I was not aware that it was so referred, but supposed as a matter of course it had been referred to the Committee on Patents, and had given some attention to the matter before I discovered that fact; and as it was in the possession of a very competent committee I made no difficulty about it. I had given some attention to it, and from my examination of the bill and my conference with the Commissioner of Patents was disposed to be favorable to the bill, predicated my opinion in that respect upon certain facts and information which had been placed in my hands in regard to it. I shall be glad to know from the chairman of the Committee on Finance for what reasons the committee has recommended the striking out of the second and third sections; and on hearing his reasons I may perhaps think it necessary to submit to the Senate some facts which I have before me in relation to the matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance had not sufficient evidence before them to show that a new officer, called the solicitor of patents, ought to be created. We had no evidence showing the necessity of such an office. At all events, the mode of appointment was not such as we would sanction if the new office was to be created, that is, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior on the nomination of the Commissioner of Patents without the advice and consent of the Senate. On the whole, the only duty of a solicitor of the Patent Office may be done by a good clerk or by an examiner. As we had increased the number of examiners of each class four in number, that is twelve in all, one could readily be detailed from the class whose salary is $2,400 to perform the duties of solicitor. And there appears to be no necessity for creating the office of solicitor. If you create the office of solicitor in this bureau, you will have the same demand from all the bureaus of the Government. We thought at this period of the session it was not worth while to embark in the business of making new offices in this way.

The third section proposes to increase the salaries of assistant examiners from $1,800 to $2,000. They are all included in the increase of pay provided by the twenty per cent. resolution for this year. We saw, therefore, no pressing necessity for increasing their pay now; and if there be any propriety in increasing their pay at all the question may properly go over to next session. We therefore reported the bill simply providing for an increased force in the Patent Office, increasing the number of examiners and assistant examiners because of the increased amount of business. The cases pending during the last year, I am informed, were sixteen thousand as against nine thousand the year before, showing a very large increase of business. There are general complaints in the country that the business of the Patent Office is getting behind. The Commissioner represents that with this increase of force he would be able by next winter to catch up.

For these reasons, briefly given, because we had not much time to consider it, we reported the bill, with an amendment striking out the second and third sections. I am sorry myself the bill did not go to the Committee on Patents, because it would then have had the advantage of the examination and experience of the Senator from West Virginia. The Committee on Finance gave it only a brief consideration, having so many other matters to attend to.

Mr. WILLEY. I see no difference of opinion between the Committee on Finance and myself, and so far as I know the Committee on Patents, in regard to the propriety, indeed the absolute necessity, of increasing the clerical force of the Patent Office. The only objection made by the Senator from Ohio is to the second and third sections of the bill. The second section provides for the creation of the office of solicitor of patents. My short experience in connection with the business of the Patent Office has satisfied me that there is a variety of complicated questions involving legal points constantly arising before that branch of the Interior Department. There are many applications for the extension of patents, involving very frequently nice questions of law, nice legal distinctions, demanding, in my opinion, the appointment of some gentleman competent to consider such questions, and they are of such variety and extent as to require the constant attention of some competent gentleman to that character of business. Inasmuch as there is a large amount of surplus money in the Patent Office fund, and as the bill itself provides that the solicitor of patents if appointed shall be paid from the Patent Office fund, creating no additional liability on the part of the Treasury of the United States, I was of the opinion, and I am still, that it would be better to create such an office, and fill it by some competent gentleman to discharge its duties.

It must be obvious to Senators, I think, on the least reflection that there is a necessity for such an office, that there is a necessity for the appointment of some gentleman who shall direct his entire attention to questions of this character constantly arising in the administration of the business of the Patent Office. I know from information that has come before the Committee on Patents during the last session that questions frequently do arise involving a good deal of legal learning and the necessity for nice legal discrimination; and in questions relative to the extension of patents and a variety of other questions constantly coming before the Commissioner of Patents, it would very much contribute to the public welfare and interest and to the proper discharge of the duties of that office if the Commissioner had some competent legal gentleman with whom he might consult in reference to such matters.

As to the third section, increasing the compensation of the first assistant examiners, the disbursing clerk, and the librarian, I am inclined to think, upon an examination of the facts and figures before me, that the recommendation of the Commissioner of Patents in that respect commends itself to our consideration. The first assistant examiners now get a compensation of $1,800 per annum. The librarian gets a salary of $1,800, with some extra compensation for translations, amounting, as I understand from the Commissioner of Patents, to two or three hundred dollars a year, never making his compensation exceed $2,100; and yet, from the nature of his duties, a gentleman of very considerable capacity is required, a gentleman of a good deal of learning, a gentleman of such capacity and such learning as a salary of $1,800 would not be likely to command. The salary of the disbursing clerk, the only other officer whose salary is proposed to be increased in this section, is also $1,800. I learn from the Commissioner of Patents and other quarters that every other disbursing clerk in a Department receives $2,000; and from the figures before me as to the increase of business in the Patent Office, and from the character and nature of his duties, their extent and variety, it does seem to me that this disbursing clerk ought to receive an equal compensation with other disbursing clerks in the Departments.

Now, sir, I ask the attention of Senators for a moment to some of the facts which I have in my possession, which will go to show the necessity of an increase of clerical force in the Patent Office. The number of applications for patents during the year 1866 was 16,269. The number of patents issued during that year, including reissues and designs, was 9,450. The caveats filed were 2,723. The applications for extension of patents were 67; and all these extensions involve more or less the decisions of legal questions, sometimes very important legal questions, sometimes questions involving very nice legal distinctions. In one year there arose before that department 67 applications for extension of patents, and 58 patents were extended. The money received during the year 1866 on application for patents, reissues, &c., was $460,798 20, and for copies and recording assignments, &c., $34,867 18, making a total amount of $495,665 38, all of which money has to go under the supervision of the disbursing clerk; and it will be observed that it is made up of small sums involving a great deal of attention and many items. The expenditures for that year demonstrate that fact. The expenditures of the year were, for salaries, including $29,107 48 additional pay as per act of June 18, 1866, $149,623 17; for contingent expenses, consisting of a great amount of small items, $95,006 60; for temporary clerks, $115,381 76; withdrawals, $540; refunding money paid by mistake, $924; fees to judges in appeal cases, $248 75, making a total amount expended last year of $361,724 28. Here is a statement of the condition of the patent fund:

Amount to the credit of the fund January 1, 1866.....	$130,184 78
Amount of receipts during the year.....	495,665 38
Total.....	625,850 16
From which deduct the amount of expenditures.....	361,724 28
Leaving to the credit of the patent fund January 1, 1867.....	264,125 88
Surplus of receipts over expenditures during the year.....	133,941 10

The Senate will perceive, therefore, that there are ample funds to meet all the increased expenditures which this bill will occasion and which seem to be demanded by the necessities of the department. The business of the Patent Office was between five and six times as great in the year 1866 as it was in the year 1861, and yet this department has but the same force to perform this amount of labor that it had then, and no more clerks, no more assistants, although the duties have increased and the difficulties in the discharge of those duties are constantly increasing. I think there is evident necessity for a solicitor or some advisory officer, some gentleman of legal attainments who will be able to advise the Commissioner of Patents in respect to the nice legal questions arising before him. Notwithstanding the praiseworthy and energetic efforts of the Commissioner of Patents to keep up the business of that office, he is now behind six to eight months in the average in the various classes of business. I have before me a table showing the business of the office for each year from 1837 to 1866. I will not trouble the Senate with it; but it shows a gradual increase, and during the last few years a remarkable increase; and I am assured by the Commissioner of Patents that the indications now are that the increase of business during the present year will be much greater than it has ever been heretofore. Here is a short synopsis of the table:

"The foregoing shows that the number of applications for patents received in 1866 exceeded that of 1865 by nearly fifty per cent., and that of 1864 by more than one hundred per cent., and the number of caveats filed exceeded that of 1865 by nearly two hundred per cent. The number of patents issued exceeded that of 1865 by nearly fifty per cent., while that of 1866 exceeded any previous year more than thirty per cent.

"The receipts into the patent fund exceeded that of 1865 by more than forty-two per cent., while the expenditures were increased less than thirty-three per cent., and 1866 exceeded that of any previous year in receipts by more than thirty-six per cent.

"If the business of the office continues to increase as now, and as it has for several months last past, it is not unreasonable to suppose that the number of applications during the present year will amount to nearly, if not quite, twenty thousand. This very great increase of the business of the office renders it absolutely necessary that the clerical and examining force should be correspondingly augmented."

There is no difference, and it seems to me there can be no difference, of opinion in regard to the propriety and the necessity, to meet the interests and demands of the country, of an increase of the clerical force; and I am assured on conference with the Commissioner of Patents, and a careful one, too, in which he was kind enough to give me all the information in reference to the matter that I desired, that the appointment of a solicitor would very greatly expedite the business of that office, and would contribute much to the satisfaction of the discharge of the duties of the office, especially in respect to applications for the extension of patents and the just and proper decision of those nice legal distinctions constantly arising in the discharge of the duties of that office. I am satisfied also, from information received not only from the Commissioner of Patents, but from other gentleman familiar with the business of that office, that the increase of compensation for the officers and clerks provided for in this bill is not unreasonable. The duties upon them are increasing constantly; the responsibilities are constantly increasing; and while I am not so clear and decided in my conviction in regard to the propriety of increasing the salaries of the four officers designated in the third section of the bill, I am satisfied from the best examination I have been able to give to the subject that the appointment of a solicitor of patents would very materially contribute to the best interests of the country and to the proper and judicious and rightful discharge of the duties of that office. While we have been increasing the compensation of clerks in various other Departments, it strikes me that the compensation of these clerks in the Patent Office should be at least augmented so as to be upon an equality with that of clerks in other Departments, who I am certain do not discharge duties of any more importance or any more beneficial to the interests of the country. Inasmuch as the House of Representatives have passed the bill, as I suppose after giving it due consideration, though I have not had a conference with the Committee on Patents, nor do I know whether the gentlemen constituting that committee have given their attention to it, I, speaking for myself, would prefer to see the bill passed as it came from the House, with all the sections just as they are. I believe that it is right that it should so pass. It will not increase the burden of the Government, and I am assured by the Commissioner of Patents that if this bill is passed it will not only be no burden on the Government, there being an ample surplus fund of the Patent Office to pay all this increase of compensation and the salary of the additional officers, but I am assured by him that it will increase the funds of the Patent Office in a ratio much greater than these salaries will take anything from them. I hope it will be passed without the amendment recommended by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONNESS. I have nothing to say as to the compensations which shall be paid to these officers, as proposed in the House bill to which this amendment is offered; but I deem it a proper time to allude to a circumstance of, as I think, material consequence and importance connected with the Patent Office and the administration of law there. I undertake to say, from some knowledge within my possession, that the erection of the office of solicitor there, no matter what compensation is paid him, and the increase of compensation to the clerks, will not secure a just administration of law until there are some other changes made there. A case came to my knowledge recently which this furnishes an opportunity to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to. I refer to the proceedings under an act approved July 26, 1866, "to extend the time of letters-patent issued to Thaddeus Hyatt." The Senate will remember that an act was passed just prior to the adjournment of the long session of the last Congress, and it is provided in the act which I have before me that—

"The Commissioner of Patents is hereby directed, upon the presentation of said patent," * * * "to extend said patent by making a certificate thereon, upon a certified copy thereof, of such extension, in the name of said Thaddeus Hyatt, if in his judgment, upon full hearing, that the same should be granted."

The "hearing" is provided for by law. Now, sir, that extension was granted of about even date with the passage of the act, and the "full hearing" consisted in copies of Mr. Hyatt's letters being laid before the Commissioner. There never was any hearing granted; there was never any time taken to grant a hearing; but the reissue was made in a manner so unjustifiable and so utterly in violation of the statute that I felt it my duty at this time to call public attention to the fact, and to say, based upon my knowledge of this case, that the erection of the office of solicitor in the Patent Office will not secure a just administration of that office. I intend, in pursuance of this matter, to offer a resolution calling for copies of the papers from the Interior Department, connected with the reissue of the patent in this case, to show the manner in which business is done there. I feel it my duty at this time to call public attention to this important fact.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am quite averse to bills that come in here at the very close of the session, when there is very little opportunity for an examination and consideration of them, increasing the force in particular Departments. There has been ample time during this session and during the previous session to have that matter thoroughly understood and investigated if that time had been improved; but it comes here just at the last moment, though we cannot suppose that this matter has only within a very recent period received the consideration of the Commissioner. But, sir, from what I know of the business of the office I am very well satisfied that an increase of the force of assistant examiners is necessary. Therefore, upon my own knowledge and belief, acquired from some previous acquaintance with it, I shall support that part of the bill which has been recommended by the Committee on Finance. I am at a loss, however, to conceive what necessity there is for a solicitor. I am not convinced by the statement made by the honorable Senator from West Virginia on that subject, because I think that there is sufficient legal ability in the department already, which the Commissioner can at any time avail himself of to acquire any legal information he may desire. The Senate is aware that there are three persons holding office as examiners-in-chief. Their business is strictly legal, to give legal opinions upon what has passed through the assistant examiners. Two of these gentlemen at least, one from New York and one from Vermont, are gentlemen of high legal attainments. One of them has been himself at the head of the Patent Office heretofore; and the other, Judge Foot, of New York, is a very able lawyer, very thoroughly versed in patent law. I do not think the Commissioner of Patents could get better advice anywhere upon legal questions arising in his department than he could get from those two gentlemen before whom all such questions naturally come, and who certainly would be ready to give advice at any time he should require it.

Under these circumstances, with a force in the office like that, which is legal in its character and legal in its intention in every way, I cannot understand what necessity there is to set the example in this bureau of an additional officer who shall be considered a solicitor and be called a solicitor for the purpose of giving legal advice to the head of the office. That is my strong impression, and until that impression is removed in some way I certainly cannot vote for the second section of the bill.

As to the other section in regard to an increase of salary, I have nothing to say; but the persons proposed to be increased are, like other fourth-class clerks, receiving a salary of $1,800 a year, and their salaries have been just as much increased as the salaries of all other classes by the addition of the twenty per cent. which they get for this year. I think under the circumstances we had better agree to the proposition of the Committee on Finance; and certainly these parts of the bill can wait until we meet again and have a chance more fully to investigate the subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the act of 1861—only six years ago—which established the board of examiners-in-chief, clothed them with the powers and imposed upon them the duties of doing all that this solicitor is supposed to be required to do by this bill, and some things more. The apparent object of the act of 1861 was to provide not merely one person but a board, who should be the law and scientific board of the Patent Office; and the section which creates that board illustrates more perfectly than anything I can say will precisely the idea and scope that the law makers had, and the state of the law force of the Patent Office at that time. It is the second section of the act of March 2, 1861. It declares:

"For the purpose of securing greater uniformity of action in the grant and refusal of letters-patent, there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three examiners-in-chief, at an annual salary of $3,000 each, to be composed of persons of competent legal knowledge and scientific ability, whose duty it shall be, on the written petition of the applicant for that purpose being filed, to revise and determine upon the validity of decisions made by examiners when adverse to the grant of letters-patent; and also to revise and determine in like manner upon the validity of the decisions of examiners in interference cases, and, when required by the Commissioner, in applications for the extension of patents; and to perform such other duties as may be assigned to them by the Commissioner. From their decisions appeals may be taken to the Commissioner of Patents in person, upon payment of the fee hereinafter prescribed. The said examiners-in-chief shall be governed in their action by the rules to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Patents."

Then there is another act well known to the Senate, an older law, which provides for a still further appeal to the judges of the supreme court for the District of Columbia in a case where the litigants choose to contest it further. The Senate will perceive, therefore, that only six years ago a full law and scientific force advisory to the Commissioner was provided, subject to perform any duty or give any advice he chose to require of them, with jurisdiction over extensions of patents, over applications for patents, over interference-cases, beside the general jurisdiction subject to his discretion which the section provides. As has been said by my friend from Maine, two of these gentlemen are persons mature in years, ripe in legal and other scholarship, as much so as any gentleman connected with the department, as much so I can say with all respect as the very judges of the supreme court of this District themselves, competent for any law question; and the third member of the board is a gentleman who, although not a lawyer, is a man distinguished for his practical and scientific knowledge, eminent in it. What more can the law require? To be sure it is said by my friend from West Virginia that the funds we pay for these offices are patent funds; but there is no reason in the world why patent funds should be wasted. I know my friend does not intend that they shall be wasted, but in my judgment this will be a waste. There is no reason why these funds should be paid out unnecessarily, because if they accumulate to an absolutely overgrowing size they can be applied to some other public purposes. There is need enough of money.

It seems to me clear, then, that the law has already provided in the fullest manner for this very case, and there has been appointed to carry out the law a perfectly competent and unexceptionable board against whom no reproach whatever exists; so that I hope the amendment recommended by the committee will be agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. Of course I was perfectly aware of the section of the law to which the Senator from Vermont has referred. I was not so well aware of the legal and eminent character of the gentlemen composing that board. I doubt not they are such as he has described them to be. There is no objection to the board; there is no objection to the character of the board; but eminent as they are in legal ability and scientific ability, the fact nevertheless remains that they are behind about seven months in appeals to the board, and it was to show the necessity of an additional officer that I read such long details of the extraordinary amount of increase in the business of the Patent Office demanding that that board should have assistance in the discharge of its duties, that the interests of the country required it, that it was not right that claims should be delayed for the want of the necessary provision on the part of Congress six or eight months to await a decision from the board, which, however eminent and competent to decide, had not the physical ability to do all the business promptly that it was required that they should do. The main object of this bill is to provide an officer whose attention shall be directed exclusively to legal questions arising out of the transactions of the Patent Office, who may be an assistant of this board, who may devote his attention to the preparation of cases that they may be presented to the board for their decision without the additional labor of looking into the cases and preparing them for decision.

I only mentioned the fact that there was a surplus of Patent Office funds to show that this bill did not make any demand upon the Treasury of the United States otherwise than upon the funds belonging to the Patent Office; and I mentioned in connection with that fact that I had reason to believe, from the examination I had given to this case, that the result of the appointment of these officers, and of the dispatch of the business of the country, would be an increase of the Patent Office funds to an amount greater than the additional salaries would reach.

Now, sir, it is necessary because the business of the country is behind; it is because the board to which allusion has been made, eminent as it is in scientific skill and in legal knowledge, has not been able to keep up with the business of the country. I am informed by the Commissioner of Patents, and I have no reason to doubt his word, that in matters of appeal now before the board business is six or seven months behind. That is too long for the country to wait when that department itself has ample means to provide men who shall be able to keep up with the business of the country, and it is upon that ground that the application for this solicitor is made. It is to enable that board, eminent as it is, to keep the business of the country up with the demands of the department. The business of this department is now in its various branches from six to eight months behind, and in matters of appeal to the board about as far behind as in other branches. The gentlemen constituting the board cannot devote their attention exclusively to legal points arising before them, and to the matters of appeal before them. They have to divide their attention between legal questions and their scientific examinations. It seems to me the facts themselves are the only arguments it is necessary to mention in this case, that the business is behind, the business of this very board, eminent as it is, and competent as it is to discharge the duties properly belonging to it. Hence the Commissioner has, I think very properly, asked for an additional officer who, by devoting his attention exclusively to matters of a legal character, will enable this board to discharge the business of the country with proper dispatch. Of course we must all know when this is done it will necessarily increase the funds of the Patent Office.

This matter has not received that thorough examination from me that it would have received if it had been referred to the Committee on Patents. My attention, however, has been directed to it for several months past. Many of the facts I have mentioned have been long within my knowledge, and I have been of the opinion for a long time, or at least during the greater part of the past session, that it was absolutely necessary to give to this department greater clerical force, and to provide such other instrumentalities and agencies as would enable the examining board to keep up with the business. If, however, the Senate think otherwise, it matters not to me.

Mr. POMEROY. I have frequently been called, in the discharge of business for my constituents, to go into the Patent Office, and I have uniformly found them willing to render me every facility they could with the clerical force they had. I am confident the interest of that department suffers because it is not able, either for the want of a law or for some other reason, to employ the amount of clerical force needed. I do not know that it will always require as much clerical force as is now proposed; perhaps the demand may be temporary.

Mr. SHERMAN. We give in the bill as we amend it all that they ask, all that the Commissioner wants. The question now is whether we shall add a solicitor.

Mr. POMEROY. I am entirely in favor of the bill which the Senator has reported; and in regard to the question of a solicitor I see no reason why there should not be one, especially if the Commissioner asks for such an officer. This is not an appropriation of so much money out of the Treasury of the United States to pay the solicitor. The Patent Office is not only self-supporting, but it accumulates its support, and its fund is now larger than ever.

Mr. WILLEY. I will say to my friend that I am assured from satisfactory statements made to me by the Commissioner that the Patent Office fund will be increased more by the appointment of this officer and this additional force than the amount it will take to pay the additional compensation occasioned by the measure.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no doubt of the statement made by the Senator from West Virginia, and therefore I am in favor of the bill without the amendment; but if we cannot get the bill without the amendment, I am then in favor of it with the amendment. I am in favor of giving the Patent Office every facility we can.

I wish now to say a word in reply to what the Senator from California has stated in regard to the case that went through here last year. I wish to say that that case was very fully considered by the Senate. It was a long time before our committee. Every opportunity for an adverse influence and representation was given. I believe there are only three manufacturers in the country who manufacture the article patented, except on the Pacific coast, and all those establishments were in favor of the extension. The object of giving notice to parties to come in and contest the extension of a patent is to enable persons who are adverse to the grant to appear and make their opposition before the Commissioner of Patents. This case, however, was contested in the Senate, and all the opposition was made here that could be made against it, and that was not from a source that would make any opposition before the Commissioner of Patents. The extension was granted after a full hearing here, and a very extended hearing, as the Senator from Massachusetts well knows. I for one justify the Commissioner of Patents entirely in his action in that case; for I know that he took the best legal counsel he could get before granting the extension, and I think he was entirely justified in granting it.

Mr. SUMNER. I desire to say that on the main question I shall follow cheerfully the chairman of the Committee on Patents, whose attention I am sure has been given to this bill. I follow him willingly; and I would add also, that from my experience at the Patent Office I have reason to believe that there is need for this addition of force. But I should not have said anything on this occasion but for the criticism that has been made on an act of the last Congress. There was a patent extended, after considerable discussion in this Chamber, and certainly consideration in the other Chamber; and now the action of the Commissioner of Patents under that act of extension has been unexpectedly opened to criticism. I desire here to express my belief that Congress was right in the act of extension that it passed; and my further belief that the Commissioner of Patents, in what he did under the act of Congress, acted sincerely, justly, and as became a public officer. I am unwilling to hear his conduct called in question on that occasion without bearing my testimony to what he did. I believe that in all respects in that action he was above criticism.

Having made these remarks, which I offer simply as my testimony founded on my personal knowledge of that case, I take my seat.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say in reply to my friend from West Virginia and my friend from Kansas as to the solicitor part of the argument, that in the first place I do not understand that we are not paying out public money when we pay this officer. The fees that are paid into the Patent Office belong to the United States. It is true that by law we provide for their being kept as a fund, but we have a perfect right by law to change the application of that money when the fund gets so large that we can properly take a part of it and make use of it for other purposes; so that in effect it is just as much taking part of the public money as it would be if it was money raised by taxation. It accumulates from the fees inventors pay for filing their applications, getting patents and extensions, and so on. So much for that.

Now, then, as to the duties of this officer and the necessity for his appointment. It is well known that before the law of last session inventors were allowed to appeal to the examiners-in-chief without paying any fees, and therefore everybody appealed. If an assistant examiner or a principal examiner decided against an application the applicant appealed because it did not cost him anything, and he had another chance. But by a law passed last year we provided that on these appeals a fee should be paid of ten dollars, I think, or a certain sum, which has diminished immensely the number of appeals; so that there will be no difficulty in the board of examiners working off their cases in hand.

Now, what can this solicitor do if this amendment is not agreed to? What can he do on the subject of relieving the examiners-in-chief from any of their duties? The law points out the duties of the examiners-in-chief; it makes them a court, a tribunal who are to hear and determine all the classes of cases that I have referred to when they come before them in the regular way. Now what does this bill provide that this solicitor of patents shall do? He "shall render all reasonable aid in the transaction of the business of said office that may be required of him by said Commissioner." That is his duty, and he would have no more right to sit on an appeal to the board of examiners-in-chief, or to interfere or to act in it, than I would or the Senator from Kansas under that law, because I wish to remind my friend again that this board of examiners is a legally constituted tribunal, whose jurisdiction is fixed and whose duties are fixed, and if therefore you intend to relieve the board from any part of their quasi judicial duties by the appointment of this solicitor you must say so in the law. I think, then, it is apparent, and it will be apparent to my friend from West Virginia, to whom this bill was not referred, and who therefore has not of course examined its details, and I presume and to my friend from Kansas, that the scope of this House bill was not, if you take it as it reads, and that is the only evidence we have on the subject, to constitute additional force to hear appeals from examiners or to try interference or extension causes; but it was to provide an ornamental officer who should render the Commissioner of Patents all reasonable aid in the performance of his duties, and who is to be paid out of the public money which is received from the sources I have named for the performance of this "reasonable aid." I do not believe in that sort of thing at all. They have got law force enough there. If they have not, increase the board so that whoever is appointed can perform the duties that are now imposed by law on them.

Mr. CONNESS. An issue has been made by a Senator upon the statement that I saw fit to make this morning, connected with the re-issue of a patent to Thaddeus Hyatt. I did not, as stated by the Senator, bring in controversy or in question the propriety of the passage of the act of July 26, 1866; so that that part of the issue is gratuitously made. In regard to the other part, the conduct of the Commissioner of Patents in the reissue in that case, I will call for the official papers in the case and let the statement of the Senator be tried in the light of the facts that those papers present.

Mr. WILLEY. I hope, sir, that the Hyatt case will not be brought into the consideration of this bill. It does not seem to have any connection with it whatever. I know nothing about that case myself, whether the Commissioner did right or did wrong in the premises. The question before the Senate is, ought this bill to pass, increasing the force of that department so as to enable it promptly and properly to discharge its duties, or not? and whether it ought to pass or not depends upon the facts and the reasons upon which it is asked.

I must demur to a repetition of the argument of the Senator from Vermont, that I am urging the passage of this bill, or the second section of it, because it will not take any funds out of the Treasury of the United States, but simply out of the fund of the Patent Office; and that therefore it will relieve the United States of a burden. I made no such argument. My argument was predicated upon my belief that it was necessary to give the Commissioner of Patents this additional officer to enable him to discharge the duties devolving upon his office. I only referred to the fact that it would be no increase of burden upon the Treasury of the United States, because his compensation would be taken out of the Patent Office. It is true that fund belongs to the United States; but the argument I meant to make was that the office itself was necessary; not that we were to create an office simply because the amount necessary to pay him his salary would be taken out of the Patent Office fund. I had no such idea as that; and the Senator neglected to reply to the main point of my argument in that direction, as it seems to me that we had good cause to believe that the creation of this office, in connection with the other additional force provided for by this bill, would so increase the receipts of the Patent Office that, in point of fact, the payment of this compensation would not be taken out of the existing fund at all. That is to say, it would so expedite the transaction of business and thus have such an influence on the increase of business in that office that the increased business thereby brought to that office would more than compensate for the payment of this salary out of the Patent Office fund.

The Senator is somewhat mistaken in saying that I have not examined this bill in its details. I remarked awhile ago that I had not examined it, perhaps, as it would have been examined if it had been referred to the Patent Office Committee and considered there. It is, however, a matter that has been occupying my attention for some months past. I think the creation of this office of solicitor, as well as the other provisions of the bill, would contribute to the expeditions and useful discharge of the duties of the Patent Office without any additional burden to the country; and therefore I was in favor of the passage of the bill without the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARLAN. What is the amendment? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is to strike out the second and third sections of the bill, which will be read.

The Secretary read the second and third sections.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will repeat to the Senator from Iowa, who was not present when I reported this bill, the explanation I then made to the Senate. This bill as referred to the Committee on Finance contained three sections. The first provided for an increase of the clerical force in addition to the present force of the Patent Office. The second section provided for a solicitor of patents, a new office, the similitude of which I believe is not in any of the Executive Departments. There is no solicitor to a bureau that I know of. There are solicitors for some of the Departments; but a solicitor for a bureau is a novel office. This is the first proposition to make one. The third section increased the compensation of the assistant examiners from $1,800 to $2,000. Their pay has already been increased, as I have stated, by the twenty per cent. joint resolution. The Committee on Finance are willing to give the increased force required, more examiners, more assistant examiners, and more second assistant examiners, but thought it was not proper now, at this stage of the session, to create the office of solicitor of the Patent Office and to increase the salaries of the assistant examiners. That is the question involved, and I trust the amendment will be agreed to. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope we shall take the question on each section separately. I ask for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question will first be on striking out the second section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest that if that section is to be adopted at all the officer ought to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator move an amendment?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; I am opposed to the whole section.

Mr. FOWLER. I move to amend the section by making it read "the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint," &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us vote first on striking out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senate refuse to strike out the section it can be amended afterward.

Mr. FOWLER. Very well; I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance, to strike out the second section.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Conkling, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Cole, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Fowler, Howard, Morton, Norton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Sprague, Thayer, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Ferry, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, and Saulsbury—11.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment is to strike out the third section.

Mr. HARLAN. I doubt very much whether that ought to be stricken out. I think the point suggested by the Senator from Ohio can be obviated by a slight amendment, so as to make this increase of pay commence on the 1st day of next July, and then I am quite sure it is right. As I understand, the twenty per cent. allowed by a law of the last Congress applies to officers during the current fiscal year, which will terminate on the 30th of June. I therefore move to amend the third section by inserting in the proper place "from and after the 30th of June next."

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust that section will not be agreed to for another reason which I did not state before. This whole question of the salaries of public officers is a very difficult one. Now, the salaries have all been graded according to their rank. The assistant examiners in the Patent Office have been put on the grade of fourth-class clerks. If you change now the relative pay of any of these various employes, you make more dissatisfaction far than you give relief. I know that the examiners, who also claim an increase of pay, say that this would be a great injustice to them. They are men of experience, learned in the law; men who have practical experience in their department and are chiefs of their divisions. They get $2,400, while the assistant examiners get $1,800. These grades have all been fixed; and if you increase the pay of one you create dissatisfaction and discontent among the others. Several of the examiners have spoken to me about it already. They are all demanding a general increase. I trust the Senate will allow that question to go over until the next session, when Congress may settle the matter by a bill carefully prepared. To make a change now by detachments deranges the whole system. I think myself the disbursing officer of the Patent Office ought to get $2,000 salary, because the disbursing clerks in the other departments and bureaus get that much; and if that stood by itself I should have no objection to that proposition, but I think it better to leave the whole matter to be provided for at the next session.

Mr. HARLAN. I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance, to strike out the third section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I will suggest another amendment, which is verbal and yet I think somewhat important. As the bill now stands it provides "that the Commissioner of Patents is authorized from time to time to appoint," &c.

I think it would be much better to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to make these appointments.

Mr. WILLEY. I will say to the Senator that that is in point of fact the case now. The Commissioner of Patents is by this bill authorized "to appoint in the manner already provided for by law," that is, through the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HARLAN. This is now entirely anomalous. There is no other head of a bureau, I think, in any Department that is authorized to make appointments, and I think it is of doubtful constitutionality. Congress is authorized to confer the right to appoint inferior officers on the heads of Departments, but I think not on the heads of bureaus. My amendment will make uniformity and harmonize the bureau and the head of the Department, and place this bureau on the same basis with other bureaus in relation to the appointments of its subordinates. I therefore move the amendment to insert the words "the Secretary of the Interior on the nomination of" before the words "Commissioner of Patents."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why want the Commissioner's nomination? Why not say simply the Secretary of the Interior shall appoint, as in other cases?

Mr. HARLAN. Then I modify the amendment by moving to strike out the words "Commissioner of Patents" and inserting "Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. SHERMAN. I can only say that the bill as it stands follows the language of former laws. All the other examiners have been appointed in that way, and I see no reason for a change unless some special cause can be assigned.

Mr. HARLAN. I am quite sure that if the Senator were at the head of a Department he would much prefer to have the bureaus under his supervision uniform in this respect.

Mr. WILLEY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLEY. As I understand it, this amendment makes an innovation upon the constant usage of appointments in that Department, and it strikes me that the amendment would be most mischievous in its operations. It is to be presumed that the Commissioner of Patents is better qualified to judge of the qualifications of these officers than any other person, better qualified to judge of the character and of the qualifications of persons applying for appointments to these places. He understands what they have to do; he knows what qualifications are necessary to enable them to perform the duties which they will have to discharge. Why provide that these particular additional officers, these clerks and this additional force shall be appointed in a different manner from the clerks who have already been appointed in the Patent Office is what I cannot understand. Why should a few clerks in the Patent Office be appointed in one way while the majority of the clerks in that office are appointed in another way?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask my friend from West Virginia a question. I am entirely indifferent how these officers are appointed, and I might agree with him that perhaps the head of the bureau could judge better as to the qualifications of the men; but as they are officers, is there not a constitutional difficulty in the way? Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as it chooses in the head of a Department, but can the power of appointment be vested in the head of a bureau? That is the difficulty in my mind. If there is no constitutional difficulty in the way, and if the appointment has been heretofore made by the head of the bureau, it ought to be continued in the same way; but if there is a constitutional difficulty the whole thing ought to be altered.

Mr. WILLEY. What I contend for is that if there is a constitutional difficulty in the way it ought to apply to all the clerks in that department alike. Why a portion of them should be appointed in one way and another portion of the officers of the same bureau should be appointed in another way, I cannot understand. The truth is that they are in effect appointed by the Secretary of the Interior as the law now stands. This officer, the Commissioner of Patents, it is presumed understands much better than the Secretary of the Interior can understand what kind of officers are best qualified to discharge the duties in his bureau. He designates the clerk that he wishes to assign to certain duties, and that clerk is appointed by and with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, as I understand; so that any improper appointment cannot be made by the Commissioner of Patents. Every appointment must have the approval and the consent of the Secretary of the Interior before it is complete. It seems to me it is but a poor privilege to the head of a bureau, especially of the character of the Patent Office, that he should be permitted to designate the officer who is to discharge duties under him, while the Secretary of the Interior has the control of the appointment of the officers, as he has had of all officers in that bureau. It must be done with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. The duties of these officers are peculiar. They are not like the duties of many other bureaus in that Department. It requires peculiar qualifications and skill, and knowledge of a certain character of business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would suggest to the Senator, then, to restore the words suggested originally by the Senator from Iowa, "appointed by the Secretary of the Interior on the nomination of the Commissioner of Patents." That would obviate the difficulty and give the Commissioner the selection, and I suppose that is all that is necessary. But really I think there is a constitutional difficulty in the way of putting it in the form the bill stands.

Mr. WILLEY. The great objection I have to it is that it comes to about the same result at last; and you have the manner of appointment of officers in the same bureau put into confusion by appointing one portion of them in one way and another portion of them in another way. It seems to me that, if there be force in the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Maine, the whole law ought to be modified, and the manner of appointment ought to be uniform; and not designate certain officers under a certain juncture of circumstances who shall be appointed in one way, while other officers to fill vacancies in the appointments already made shall be appointed in another way. It strikes me that there is a peculiar fitness in the head of this bureau having the privilege of designating in the first place the officers who are to perform duties under him. It is not like any other branch or bureau in that Department. It is not like a bureau that requires nothing but clerical qualifications. It is a matter that requires skill sometimes in the appointees. It strikes me there is an impropriety and an injustice and a detriment to the service of that bureau by changing the manner of appointment of officers in it.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not consider this matter of sufficient importance to consume very much time; but I feel quite sure that the amendment suggested by me ought to be adopted. I differ in opinion with the Senator from West Virginia on the point which he has just made, that there is anything peculiar in this bureau distinguishing it materially in this respect from any other bureau. It is true that the head of the bureau may know sometimes more about the personal qualifications of an applicant for appointment than the Secretary of the Interior; but how can he know much more than the Secretary of the Interior of the qualifications of an applicant? It is very probable that in many cases the Secretary would know better than he would. After an individual may have been appointed and may have served for some months or years, it is possible that the head of the bureau may know more of his relative qualifications than the Secretary; but that would be true of the Commissioner of the General Land Office or of the Pension Office or of any other bureau; and the head of the division would know more of the relative qualifications of a clerk than either of them, because his work would come immediately under the review of the head of the division. And so in the Patent Office, the board of examiners-in-chief would know more than the Commissioner of the qualification of those assistant examiners after they had served for some time. But I doubt very much whether Congress has the power to confer on the head of a bureau merely the right to make appointments. It is surely anomalous; and as it seems to me ought to be conferred on the Secretary of the Interior, the head of the Department. I know that no member of this body would serve as the head of any Department for any considerable length of time without desiring uniformity in this respect.

The Senator from West Virginia suggests that there would be incongruity between those hereafter to be appointed and those that are now in. I can see no evil that would grow out of this. Those that are now in the office are of course commissioned, and will serve until they die, resign, or are removed; and if a vacancy should occur in either way, then that vacancy would be filled under the existing law, and if the authority should be conferred on the Secretary of the Interior rather than the Commissioner of Patents, then it would apply equally to all appointments hereafter to be made; and this seems to have been the intention of the party who drafted this bill. It seems to be prospective in its operation, and provides "that the Commissioner of Patents is authorized from time to time to appoint in the manner already provided for by law," with the proviso at the close—

That the whole number of such additional examiners shall not exceed four of each class.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator will perceive that this will be confined simply to the additional appointees here, the additional examiners. The provision is:

Such an additional number of principal examiners, first assistant examiners, and second assistant examiners, as may be required to transact the current business of the office with dispatch.

And then it provides that they shall not exceed four in each branch, so that it especially confines it to this excepted class; and a vacancy occurring, as I understand it, in a clerkship already existing, would be filled in the manner provided by law at this time, and not come under the operation of this act, if it should pass as proposed to be amended by the honorable Senator.

Mr. HARLAN. If there were any doubt as to the meaning of the phraseology of the bill, it could be easily corrected by striking out the word "additional" and make it uniform. I will not, however, consume more of the time of the Senate on the subject.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Howe, Ramsey, Ross, Sprague, Sumner, Williams, and Yates—18.
NAYS—Messrs. Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Howard, Johnson, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Sherman, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Trumbull—17.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARLAN. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That all officers and clerks hereafter appointed in the Patent Office shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the title of the bill was amended by striking out the words "and for other purposes."

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the bill (S. No. 61) to provide for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, returned, in accordance with the request of the Senate, the resolution of the Senate fixing the day for the adjournment of Congress.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution on the same subject, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 100) to amend an act changing the location of the capital of Montana Territory; and

A bill (H. R. No. 101) for the relief of John Perry.

SALE OF SHIPS TO BELLIGERENTS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 94.

Mr. WILSON. Reports from committees are in order, and I desire to make a report.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let this bill be taken up, and then I will give way.

Mr. CONNESS. I object to that.

Mr. WILSON. This will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The business is all under the control of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow this bill to come up, I will then give way to allow him to make his report.

Mr. CONNESS. Several Senators have more or less morning business to present, and I hope the Senator will not move to take up anything until we get that disposed of, and then we can join with him to take up this bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. The morning hour has passed long since. It is half past two o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The business is all under the control of the Senate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SUMNER. What is the bill that it is proposed to take up?

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. No. 94) declaratory of the law with regard to the sale of ships to friendly belligerents.

Mr. SUMNER. On the question of taking up that bill I desire to remind the Senate that it was only on Saturday, after some consideration, that the Senate refused to take it up. It was on that occasion that I made a statement which I do not desire now to repeat, but which, as the Senator is pressing his bill, I must repeat, that this bill, on a reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations was carefully considered, and that committee came to the conclusion that it was not best to proceed with its consideration at this time. Whatever may be the merits of the bill by itself at another moment, the committee was satisfied that it was not expedient to proceed with it now. I do not go into the reasons for that conclusion, and I could not without opening a very wide debate. Suffice it to say that the measure is intimately connected with the foreign policy of this Government, with pending negotiations, and I may also say with former legislation and decisions of the Supreme Court, to say nothing else of opinions of the Attorneys General of the United States. I think, therefore, that under the circumstances, unless the Senate is prepared now to enter into a very broad field of discussion, a part of which will be of a delicate character, they had better not take up the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, as I stated the other day, the memorial upon which this bill is based was referred to the Committee on Commerce on the 9th of February. The memorial is signed by twenty-three of the heaviest shippers and merchants of the United States, headed by A. A. Low & Brothers, C. H. Marshall & Co., Grinnell, Minturn & Co., E. H. Morgan & Son, and Moses H. Grinnell. Perhaps there is more wealth and more business connected with the signers of that memorial than with any other equal number of names in the United States.

In accordance with the prayer of these memorialists, the Committee on Commerce, after careful consideration, reported a bill, a strictly mercantile bill. How this subject came before the Committee on Foreign Relations is to me a mystery. It does not belong there at all. It is intimately connected with the commercial relations of the nation, and not with its foreign relations. But, sir, I have met—not for the first time, but every time any subject has been started for the last four years connected with the real mercantile relations of the country—the ghost of the Alabama claims; and I have met that ghost so often that I am anxious it should be laid. I do not desire to see its form again.

Mr. President, I had something to do at an early day with these Alabama claims. As early as 1862 I advocated the pressure of those claims to final settlement. On the 14th of December, 1864, while Sherman was on his march to the sea, and before he had reached the sea, the Committee on the Conduct of the War, of which I was a member, was ordered to make an investigation concerning the army of the Potomac. While making that investigation I had an interview with General Grant, who had just heard from General Sherman. One of his aids had visited General Sherman, although he had not yet reached the sea. I asked General Grant whether there was any doubt about capturing Savannah. He said, "Not the slightest." Said I, "How long will it take after the capture of Savannah to capture Charleston and Wilmington, provided there is an immediate necessity for their capture?" General Grant replied, "It is a mere question of expediency when we shall capture those towns; at present we have a Navy with nothing else to do but guard them; if we guard those towns with our Navy we compel the enemy to keep garrisons in them; if we capture them we ourselves must furnish garrisons; but in case of emergency I could capture those towns in thirty days." "Well," said I, "we have now seven hundred ships-of-war in commission, with fifty-four thousand sailors; in case those three cities on the Atlantic coast were captured, what further need have you for vessels-of-war?" He replied, "Very little; we should require a few vessels-of-war in the Gulf to watch the Texas coast, and a few along the Atlantic coast; but very few indeed." Said I, "Is it not true, then, that we should have five or six hundred ships-of-war in commission, armed, provisioned, and ready for immediate use, that could be assembled in ten days at any point designated?" Said he, "Certainly we could, and those five or six hundred ships-of-war could be spared."

Sir, it was with that knowledge, a knowledge which I could not then state, that on the 14th day of December, 1864, I offered two resolutions to the Senate. The first was recommending the enlistment of an Army corps to watch the Canadian frontiers. Expeditions were being fitted out all along the Canadian frontier, not to prey upon our commerce, but to rob towns. That resolution was in these words—this was on the 14th of December, 1864, before Sherman had reached the sea:

"Whereas raids have been organized in the Canadas and Nova Scotia, and men enlisted in said British Provinces by men purporting to hold commissions from the rebels of the United States for the purpose of robbing and murdering peaceable citizens of the United States, of burning cities and villages, of piratically capturing merchant vessels and murdering their crews, being a general system of murder, arson, robberies, and plunders of the peaceable and unarmed citizens of the United States; and whereas the people of the British Provinces seem disposed to protect these thieves, robbers, incendiaries, pirates, and murderers, not only in their individual capacity, but by the quibbles of the law: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of immediately enlisting an Army corps to watch and defend our territory bordering on the lakes and Canadian line from all hostile demonstrations."

Mr. President, I offered that resolution in good faith. I believed it to be our duty then to organize an Army corps for that purpose. When I made that proposition the objection to its consideration came from the same source that the objection to this present mercantile bill comes, to wit, from the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON.] I did not propose that that Army corps should watch all along our frontier. I intended that they should watch in Montreal and Quebec. Those were the places at which to watch to prevent depredations from Canada upon the peaceable citizens of the United States; and my word for it, if we had sent an Army corps there they would have watched from Quebec and Montreal, and we should have held indemnity, not only for the depredations of the Alabama, but for all the depredations committed by British subjects upon our peaceable citizens and upon our commerce. But, sir, that resolution was objected to, and on the following day it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have never heard from the Committee on Foreign Relations on that subject from that day to this. There it has slept from that day to this.

On the same day I offered another resolution, which shared the same fate, in the following words:

"Whereas at the commencement of the present rebellion the United States were at peace with the Governments of the world, and upon terms of comity and good will with Great Britain; and whereas that nation, before the arrival on her soil of our minister accredited by the Administration of President Lincoln, precipitately acknowledged the rebels as belligerents, thus recognizing their flag upon the ocean, without which recognition it would have been regarded and treated as piratical by all other Powers; and whereas she then proclaimed perfect neutrality between a Republic with which she had entertained friendly relations for upward of half a century and its reasonable subjects; and whereas numbers of her subjects, with the knowledge of her Government, commenced fitting out British fast-sailing ships, loaded with munitions of war, for the purpose of running into our blockaded ports to the rebels, thus furnishing them the means of organizing and continuing the rebellion, and without which it could not have sustained itself six months; and whereas, in addition to the above, and with the knowledge of the Government, British subjects and members of Parliament engaged in the manufacture of piratical English ships, owned by British subjects, manned by British seamen, and sailing under British colors, for the purpose of burning, destroying, and utterly driving from the ocean all peaceful merchant vessels sailing under the United States flag; and whereas many private and unarmed American ships have been burned and destroyed by these pirates from British ports, thus causing great loss and damage to the citizens of the United States: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State be instructed immediately to make out a list of each ship and cargo thus destroyed, with a fair and separate valuation thereof, and interest thereon at the rate of six per cent. per annum from the date of capture or destruction to the date of presentation, and that he be directed to demand from the British Government payment in full for all ships and cargoes destroyed as aforesaid."

That resolution was likewise objected to by the Senator from Maryland, and on the following day was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and there it has slept the sleep of death, knowing no waking.

But, sir, in process of time, and in his own time, the present Secretary of State did make a demand upon Great Britain, in an humble way, for compensation for the depredations of these British pirates; and I will read you the response that he received. He came not with five hundred ships-of-war and fifteen-inch columbiads aimed at the heart of the British empire, but he came, with his hat in his hand, and said, "If you please, will you pardon me for asking you to pay these little bills?" Well, sir, Great Britain did not please; but here is the response:

"FOREIGN OFFICE, December 2, 1865.

"Sir: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th ultimo having reference to the letter which my predecessor addressed to you on the 3d ultimo.

"There are many statements in your letter which I should be prepared to controvert if it were not that Her Majesty's Government consider that no advantage can result from prolonging the controversy," &c.

No good result can follow from prolonging this controversy in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government! Sir, did we hear from the Committee on Foreign Relations when that insult was offered to our Government after our flag had been insulted and almost driven from the ocean? No, sir, not a word was heard from the Committee on Foreign Relations; not even a protest.

In the mean time, sir, we went on and disbanded this fleet which was larger and stronger than all the fleets upon the earth besides our own. We had ships enough in commission at that moment that we could concentrate in ten days at any given point to have swept all the navies of the earth from the ocean. No nation was ever as well prepared to defy the universe on the ocean as was the United States at that day. But, sir, we went on and dismantled these ships-of-war; and then, after we had rendered ourselves vulnerable, the Secretary of State, with hat in hand, begged to be pardoned for asking the payment of these bills.

On the 15th of January, 1866, after we had disbanded our armies, dismantled our fleets, put our iron-clads out of commission, and were no longer in a position to demand payment at the cannon's mouth, I offered to the Senate the following resolution:

"Whereas by the recent publication of the diplomatic correspondence between this Government and the Government of Great Britain, we are fully advised that the last-named Government has refused to repair the damages inflicted upon our commerce by the agency of her subjects during the late rebellion; has declined to arbitrate the same, and, finally, further to treat upon the subject, thus exhausting all diplomatic resources, leaving to this nation but one alternative consistent with its honor: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby requested to withdraw our minister from the Court of St. James, and make proclamation of national non-intercourse; which is hereby declared to take effect after such proclamation shall have been issued."

There, sir, was the only peaceful remedy left. "You have insulted us; you have injured us; you have done us all the injury in your power; now we simply declare non-intercourse until you, Great Britain, are prepared to do us justice." That was a peaceful remedy; and had that remedy been adopted our claims against Great Britain would have been paid within ninety days from the proclamation of non-intercourse. Had the demand been made on the 14th of December, 1864, they would have been paid, because it would have been understood that it meant "pay or fight." But, sir, that resolution went to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and there it has slept the sleep that knows no waking. Nothing was done.

Since that time France has taken the hint that this continent is not large enough for an empire, and has quietly withdrawn her troops. Sir, this North American continent has not land enough for an empire or even a viceroyalty. The United States of America needs all the land on the continent of North America, and the time will come, and at no distant day, when she will own it all. But, sir, these British Provinces have gone on year after year consolidating and preparing for a viceroyalty. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations if any protest against a viceroyalty, or the establishment of a kingdom on our northern frontier, has ever gone out from the Committee on Foreign Relations? If it has, I have never heard of any such protest. No, sir, not a word has been heard from the Committee on Foreign Relations on the subject.

And now, when I introduce a purely commercial bill from the Committee on Commerce, forsooth, it will complicate our foreign relations! How complicate them? Mr. President, I have heard enough of these Alabama claims. If Great Britain is satisfied with the manner in which those claims are left, so am I. The memorialists upon whose memorial this bill has been based are more interested in the Alabama claims, and more interested in the commerce of this great nation, than any other equal number of men. I repeat, if Great Britain is contented with the position occupied by herself with regard to those Alabama claims, so am I. Those claims I was anxious to press in 1864. We were then borrowing money at the rate of $1,000,000,000 a year, and $30,000,000 was a matter of some little consequence. But, sir, since that time we have paid off between two hundred and three hundred millions of the national debt, and are now paying it off at the rate of $150,000,000 a year, and we can afford to trust Great Britain for this little bill of $30,000,000. Besides, the time is not far distant when we shall want to take a mortgage on certain land lying alongside of us, and this will be a very good claim to base the mortgage upon. If Great Britain is satisfied with her position, so am I. I do not want her to pay those Alabama claims at this time, and I do not want the ghost of those claims to come up to interfere with the legislation of this body now or at any future time.

Mr. President, we owe Great Britain no very large amount of good-will, in my judgment. In my youth I was educated to hate Great Britain. During the Revolutionary war she sent her Indian allies all along the Merrimac river, where I was born, to scalp men, women, and children, and she paid twenty dollars a scalp for babies. Then, again, she hired Hessians to come here and fight our ancestors. One of my ancestors was killed by those hired Hessians. During my early years I never was taught to entertain a very great love or affection for Great Britain. But in the process of time I was led to look upon her as our maternal parent, and you know the Bible says you must love your father and your mother. But, sir, that command is not imperative. There are circumstances where a child is not even bound to love, honor, or respect its mother. When her conduct has been such as to render her infamous before the world, neither the holy Scriptures, nor the laws of society, nor any other law, human or divine, demand of us that we should love, honor, or respect her.

Great Britain has ceased to command the respect of any nation on earth. She has ceased to be one of the first Powers of the earth. In the settlement of the German question was Great Britain invited in? Was her opinion asked? But now, forsooth, because I introduce a purely mercantile bill, (for if there ever was one introduced into this body this is one,) for fear it will offend Great Britain it must not be touched; for fear it will lead to some "delicate discussion" it must not be taken up.

Now, sir, what is this bill that I have introduced? It simply says to the citizens of the United States, "You may sell to belligerents with whom the United States Government is at peace ships, even ships-of-war, if you please," not to one, but to both belligerents. There is nothing unfriendly about it. The only reason for introducing this bill is that our citizens, as it has been construed, violate our own neutrality laws now by the sale of ships to belligerents. We have been in the habit of building ships-of-war for foreign Governments for the last twenty years. We have built several for Italy, several for Russia. During the Crimean war we held a Russian ship for months, and for aught I know for years, because England was at war with Russia. Under this bill our citizens may sell to Russia and to England; they may sell to Chili and to Spain; they may sell to any nation with whom the United States is on terms of friendly relations ships-of-war or any other ships.

Sir, I would go further than this, and that might perhaps go beyond the purely mercantile character of this bill. I would permit our citizens to manufacture arms for all the nations of the earth. It is well known that we manufacture a better breech-loader than any other nation on earth. Sharpe's rifle is a much better gun than the needle-gun. The Spencer rifle is a much better gun than the needle-gun.

Our cannon are better than those of any other nation. The heaviest broadside British gun is only a sixty-eight pounder, while we throw a fifteen-inch shot of five hundred and sixty pounds. I should be willing to furnish the world with these arms. Our position is such that we need not fear even the rebound of our own weapons.

Mr. SUMNER. Under the existing law we can furnish munitions of war.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, sir, I want to furnish ships-of-war, too.

Now, Mr. President, in this bill introduced from the Committee on Commerce is this proviso:

Provided, That the transaction is simply commercial, with no intent on the part of the seller or charterer to participate in any belligerent act, and that the vessel or steamer while in transitu is in no respect exempted from the law of contraband.

We provide that the transaction shall be purely commercial, with no intention to take part in the war in which either of the belligerents is engaged.

Now, Mr. President, I hope the Senate will pass this bill, and pass it promptly. If the Senate will pass it this morning I think I may state that it will pass the House before its adjournment. It is a very important bill. Pass this bill, sir, and I will guaranty you that Great Britain will be begging for permission to pay the Alabama claims before three months. I do not want her to pay them. We can wait, as I said before. We can trust her as long as she can pay six per cent. interest. We are able to give her credit; but, sir, the bill must be paid. There is no discount on it. I want no further negotiations on the part of the present Secretary of State. Let him attend to the McCracken smelling correspondence. [Laughter.] It is all that he ought to undertake. It is up to his entire capacity. Let him not interfere with the Alabama claims. That is a subject beyond his comprehension. I want him to attend to his legitimate duties, but I do not want him to interfere with these claims. If he were to open a correspondence to-morrow with regard to the Alabama claims he would give them all away at the demand of the British Premier and thank him for having permitted him to do it. England has once refused even arbitration. Sir, when we make the next demand for the payment of the Alabama claims I want to make it at the cannon's mouth and with a fifteen-inch shell in the mouth of the cannon.

Mr. MORTON. As a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations I will say that this bill was before us, and I believe unanimously laid upon the table. I cannot agree with the Senator from Michigan that this is simply a question of commerce. It was not a question of commerce when we considered the depredations of the Alabama. It is a question involving the neutrality of nations, and one of the most important and delicate that could be presented. This bill proposes to legislate into a law the very wrong of which we complained in the Alabama case. Our Government took the ground in reference to the Alabama claims that it was a violation of the law of nations for a neutral to build or to furnish a ship-of-war to a belligerent. Mr. Adams, in his communication to Lord John Russell, planted himself fairly and squarely on that proposition. The English Government did not deny the proposition, but evaded the force of it by assuming that they were ignorant of the character of the Alabama. It is not worth our while to go into a discussion here to-day as to whether Mr. Adams assumed a correct position or not. It is enough for us to know that we have gone before the tribunal of the public opinion of the world upon the ground that it is a violation of the neutrality of nations to build or to furnish a ship-of-war to a belligerent; and if we were now to pass this bill we should stultify ourselves before the public opinion of the world.

Independent of the Alabama claims, we cannot afford to ingraft this principle upon the law of nations. No nation that has a great commercial marine can afford to do it. It puts it in the power of any small nation, any inconsiderable nation with whom we might be at war, a South American republic that has no commercial marine at all, by going to England or to Europe and buying five or six ships-of-war, to destroy our commerce when they have none to destroy on their part. It would be a very comfortable doctrine for nations that have no commerce on the seas; but no nation that has a commerce on the seas can afford to submit to it. Four rebel cruisers destroyed nearly half of our commerce during the late war. If we should get into a war with Mexico, or any of the small South American republics, and they could get money enough to go to England and buy half a dozen iron-clads or fast sailing vessels, they could do us more injury in the way of destroying our commerce than the assessed value of the small South American Governments would be worth.

Sir, we cannot submit to this doctrine, independent of the proposition that we have placed ourselves upon the reverse position before the whole world. We have claimed that Great Britain violated the law of nations by permitting the Alabama and other ships to be fitted out in her ports as ships-of-war for the so-called confederate States. We have called upon her for compensation. She attempts to relieve herself from responsibility, not because it was not a violation of the law of nations, but because, as she alleges, she was ignorant of the character of the vessels that were fitted out. There were two ships-of-war building in French ports. We appealed to the French Government, and they were seized and prevented from sailing. Now, it is proposed that we shall enact this wrong, of which we have complained on the part of France and England, into a law, a principle of law, that would be fatal to our commerce in case of a war even with the smallest of nations.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that this motion will now be withdrawn. At any rate I desire the privilege of making a report on a little resolution which it is rather important to pass.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask for a vote on the motion to take up the bill.

Mr. WILSON. I think it will lead to debate. I ask unanimous consent to make a report.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Chair will receive the report.

TRADERS AT MILITARY POSTS.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 35) to authorize the Commanding General of the Army to permit traders to remain at certain military posts, to report it back without amendment. It is a brief resolution for the accommodation of persons emigrating across the continent, and I should like to have it put upon its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes the Commanding General of the Army to permit a trading establishment to be maintained after the 1st of July, 1867, at any military post on the frontier not in the vicinity of any city or town, and situated at any point between the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich and the eastern boundary of the State of California, when, in his judgment, such establishment is needed for the accommodation of emigrants, freighters, and other citizens; but after the commissary department is prepared to supply stores to soldiers as required by law, no trader permitted to remain at such post is to sell any goods kept by the commissary department to any enlisted man; and such traders are to be under protection and military control as camp followers.

Mr. WILSON. I desire simply to say that at the last session of Congress we passed a law abolishing sutlerships in the Army, which takes effect on the 1st day of July; but it appears there are military posts across the country where traders supply emigrants who go to California, Oregon, and the Territories. It is recommended by General Hancock that these persons, under the direction of the Commanding General of the Army, be permitted to continue their trade at such points as are thought necessary; and this resolution has been introduced for that purpose. It is simply an accommodation to the emigrants crossing the country. The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior recommending an appropriation for fulfilling treaty stipulations with certain tribes; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 100) to amend an act changing the location of the capital of Montana Territory was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories, and the bill (H. R. No. 101) for the relief of John Perry was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 112) to incorporate the Lincoln Monument Association; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCKALEW asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 113) chartering the Washington Homestead Company; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 49) to refer the claim of the trustees of A. G. Sloo to the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

EXTENSION OF T. HYATT'S PATENT.

Mr. CONNESS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to report to the Senate copies of all papers connected with the extension of patent to Thaddeus Hyatt by authority of an act to extend the time of letters-patent issued to Thaddeus Hyatt, approved July 26, 1866.

UNION PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. CONNESS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to report to the Senate the cause or causes for the suspension of work by the Union Pacific Railway Company, when the said suspension took place, and what legislation is necessary, if any, to secure the early completion of the Pacific railroad from Omaha westward.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of removing such of the Indian tribes located in the several States and Territories as may give their assent thereto, and establishing the same in the Indian Territory so-called, and upon other suitable territory, and particularly to ascertain and report the situation, condition, natural advantages, and adaptation of such Territory to the wants of said tribes as their future and permanent residence. Said committee may sit during the recess of the Senate, and shall have authority to summon witnesses and take testimony.

DISTRIBUTION OF SEEDS TO THE SOUTH.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 60) for the distribution of seeds to the people of the States lately in rebellion; which was read twice.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask for the present consideration of this joint resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the joint resolution will lie over under the rule.

Mr. FESSENDEN afterward said: I objected to the resolution reported by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I did not, perhaps, understand it exactly. I should like to have it read again. I do not want to interfere with its progress.

The Secretary read the joint resolution. It proposes to authorize the Commissioner of Agriculture to employ and use the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as he may deem necessary, out of the appropriations already made for his bureau, for the purchase and distribution to the people lately in rebellion of such seeds and plants as in his judgment may be useful or important to them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That would authorize the Commissioner to expend for seeds for the rebellious States alone more than we have appropriated for seeds for the whole country.

Mr. CAMERON. The chief of the Agricultural Bureau tells me that he has the money in his hands which he can use for this purpose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That must be a mistake. How can he have got it?

Mr. CAMERON. I have come back here so recently that I cannot tell how that is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think $50,000 is considerably more than we have appropriated for the purchase of seeds for the whole Union. This resolution gives him leave to take that sum and apply it to these particular States. I move that the joint resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture, that they may look into it and see how the case stands.

The motion was agreed to.

COLORADO TERRITORIAL LEGISLATURE.

Mr. NYE, from the Committee on Territories, reported a bill (S. No. 114) amendatory of the organic act of Colorado Territory; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. NYE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Let it be read for information.

The bill was read. It provides that hereafter the sessions of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory shall be biennial, members of the Council to be elected for four years and of the House for two years, and they are to receive six dollars a day instead of three dollars, heretofore allowed. Each House of the Legislative Assembly, in addition to the officers now allowed by law, is to elect an enrolling clerk, who is to receive five dollars per day; and the chief clerk is to receive six dollars per day, and the other officers elected by the Legislature five dollars per day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Where does that bill come from?

Mr. NYE. It comes from the Committee on Territories. It brings Colorado into harmonious action with the other Territories.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do the members of the Legislative Assembly in all the Territories receive six dollars a day?

Mr. NYE. Yes; and they meet biennially. It costs the Government the same.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought it was fixed at three dollars.

Mr. NYE. It was fixed at three dollars when the sessions were annual.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie over under the rule.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 83) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 36) for the relief of George W. Ashburn, and a joint resolution (H. R. No. 37) to authorize the Secretary of War to build dredge-boats for use at the mouth of the Mississippi river; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) to terminate a contract of a member of Congress with the Post Office Department of the United States of America.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

*Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, (the Senate concurring), That the Senate and House of Representatives do hereby each give consent to the other that each House of Congress shall adjourn the present session from the hour of twelve o'clock meridian of Thursday next, the 28th day of March instant, to assemble again on the first Wednesday in May, the first Wednesday in June, the first Wednesday in September, and the first Wednesday in November of this year, unless the President of the Senate pro tempore and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall by joint proclamation, to be issued by them ten days before the times herein fixed for assembling, declare that there is no occasion for the meeting of Congress at such time.*

Mr. FESSENDEN. The resolution evidently needs a good deal of amendment. It seems we are to meet on the first Wednesday of May, and keep on in continuous session, adjourn again or do something, and meet on the first Wednesday of June, and so on. But, sir, there is a very serious question in my mind whether an arrangement such as that appears to be would be within our constitutional power, and I move it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary to look into it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Why not dispose of it now? I hope we are not going to agree to such a resolution as that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it had better be referred at any rate.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I believe the Senator from Massachusetts had the adjournment resolution which this body passed on Saturday last recalled from the House with a view to make a motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is on the table a communication from the House returning that resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the motion to reconsider will be called up and disposed of.

Mr. WILSON. I moved to reconsider the vote adopting that resolution, but as the House resolution has been referred to the Senator's own committee, perhaps they can arrange the matter satisfactorily and let it lie upon the table for the present. I simply want the motion to reconsider entered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we shall act on it now. If we do not reconsider, the question is settled so far as we are concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has made a motion to reconsider the vote adopting the resolution passed by the Senate on Saturday.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to my friend from Illinois whether it would be wise to act on that matter now, inasmuch as the House resolution has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Would it be advisable to act on our resolution before that is considered by the committee? I think it had better lie on the table until we hear the report of the committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we had better act on the question of reconsideration, and that disposes of the whole subject if we decide against that motion. There is nothing to send to the committee about the question of adjournment. There is no question to investigate in the resolution which was passed by this body. Gentlemen seem to assume that the Senate is going to change its position. I do not know that it is. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes to change his, but it does not follow that the Senate will change its position. The Committee on the Judiciary want to know what the disposition of the Senate is. If the resolution we passed on Saturday is not to be reconsidered, but to stand as we passed it, it is perfect folly to spend time in seeing whether we can remodel the House resolution, or whether we can agree to it in committee as it is. The Senate has the whole question before it now, and I think we may as well have the yeas and nays on this motion to reconsider and settle the matter. If the Senate adheres to its action on Saturday, there is an end of the matter so far as we are at present concerned. If it refuses to adhere, that will be an indication that some other mode of adjourning is desired by the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The other House, by sending us a resolution different from ours, evidently seems to entertain a different idea, and I do not think it advisable by insisting upon our passing this resolution and sending it to them to force them to act upon it, and perhaps disagree to it, which might place us in such a predicament as that the President could take the matter into his own hands, and say that Congress should be adjourned to a certain time—proroguing us. That was the reason why I made the suggestion that I did. If the other House had not taken action I would agree with the Senator, that we had better settle the question of reconsideration and pass our original resolution at once; but inasmuch as the House of Representatives has sent to us a different proposition, I thought it wise to consider that before we proceeded to act definitely, and perhaps place ourselves in a situation of embarrassment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The House of Representatives has not voted upon our resolution at all. It was recalled at the instance of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not say they had; I wish my friend to understand me; but they have sent us a different proposition.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The reason of that, I apprehend—if we were allowed to go into the reason of it—would be found to be because we withdrew our resolution and they acted under the misapprehension, as I think, that the Senate was not satisfied with its previous action.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That may be or may not; but suppose we should send our resolution back to the House and they should disagree to it, we should then be at odds.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That would not be such a disagreement as the Senator referred to. If they modify our resolution, the Senate could concur in their action, and that would bring up the whole question.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider, and let the Senate determine whether to adhere to its action or not.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me we are not now in a condition to proceed with the motion to reconsider. On the motion of the Senator from Maine, the House resolution has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. How can we proceed with this subject-matter unless we have that House resolution before us? It seems to me that we are not fair to the House, nor, I submit, fair to ourselves, if we proceed with this subject unless we have the whole matter before us. We ought to have our own proposition and the House proposition and between the two we may make a choice. The Senate has already voted to refer the House proposition to the Committee on the Judiciary, partly with a view to ascertain, I believe, the constitutional question which is supposed to be involved in that resolution. I am ready to await the report of that committee. When that comes in I shall be ready to consider the House proposition or to resume the consideration of the Senate resolution of Saturday; but until the report of that committee is received it seems to me that we are not in a condition to proceed with the question. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business. We all want to go into executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

GEORGE W. ASHBURN.

Mr. ECKLEY introduced a preamble and joint resolution for the relief of George W. Ashburn; which was read a first and second time.

The preamble and joint resolution recite that George W. Ashburn seized certain property belonging to W. F. Stewart, in the State of Tennessee, which property was being used by the southern confederacy; that said property was afterward confiscated by the district court of the State of Tennessee under the provisions of the act of August 6, 1861, and was by the order of said court sold, and the proceeds of said sale placed in the Treasury of the United States, including the portion that belonged to Mr. Ashburn under the provisions of said act, which amount still remains in the Treasury.

The joint resolution directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the said George W. Ashburn the sum of $3,888 37, the amount belonging to him under said act, according to the decree of the said district court.

Mr. ECKLEY. I call the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. As this bill contains an appropriation, it should go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ECKLEY. I beg the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] to withdraw his objection. This joint resolution was fully considered during the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. If this joint resolution gives rise to debate it must go over, unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] insists upon his point of order, in which case it will be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would be very willing to withdraw my point of order if this joint resolution can be debated, so that we may know what it is. But I cannot vote for an appropriation bill without some explanation of what it is.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution cannot be debated except by unanimous consent; and that unanimous consent cannot be asked during the morning hour on Monday. But if the point of order is insisted upon, then the joint resolution must go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ECKLEY. Then I ask leave to withdraw the joint resolution.

No objection being made, the joint resolution was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. ECKLEY subsequently introduced a joint resolution embracing the same provisions as that above stated; which was read a first and second time.

The question being on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ECKLEY called for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose this subject has never been before any committee of this House.

Mr. ECKLEY. Oh, yes; there has been a unanimous report from the Committee of Claims of the last Congress.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ECKLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOUSE RESTAURANT.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I submit the following:

Resolved, That in consideration of the change made in the privileges of the keeper of the House restaurant since proposals were made for the same, the Clerk be authorized to cancel the contract of William Smelt, and receive new bids for the privilege of keeping said restaurant.

I offer this resolution at the suggestion of my colleague, [Mr. SPALDING,] who has been called from his seat. At the time the contract was let the keeper of the restaurant—

Mr. BENJAMIN. Is this resolution debatable?

The SPEAKER. If it gives rise to debate it will go over under the rule.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I do not wish to debate it. I call the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The keeper of the restaurant himself desires this.

The question was upon seconding the call for the previous question; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 25, noes 29; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, and Mr. HAIGHT were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 55, noes 45.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 72) to exempt wrapping-paper made from wood or corn-stalks from internal tax, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) directing the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the execution of a law passed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny;

An act (S. No. 38) in relation to the acknowledgment of deeds in the District of Columbia;

An act (S. No. 77) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to reimburse the State of West Virginia for moneys expended for the United States in enrolling, equipping, and paying military forces to aid in suppressing the rebellion," approved June 21, 1866;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 16) for the relief of the destitute in the southern and southwestern States;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) directing the Secretary of War to furnish certain arms and equipments to the State of Tennessee;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 23) to make valid the laws of New Mexico passed at the session of the Legislature held at Santa Fé, from 3d day of December, 1866, to 31st day of January, 1867; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 29) to terminate a contract of a member of Congress with the Post Office Department of the United States of America.

CLAIMS FROM INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas it is alleged that a claims commission of the War Department is now in session in Washington which has allowed to citizens of States lately in rebellion claims growing out of the destruction or appropriation of, or damages to, property by the Army of the United States, while engaged in suppressing the rebellion, some of which claims have been paid, all of which proceedings, according to the uniform understanding previously in this Congress, are without authority of law: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims when appointed be and are instructed to ascertain whether such claims commission exists; the authority therefor; whether said commission has allowed any claim or claims without authority of law; whether, if so, they have been paid, and by what authority; whether any appropriation has been made therefor; and what law, if any, may be necessary or proper; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

LEUTENANT JOHN H. OSLER.

Mr. BINGHAM introduced a bill for the relief of Lieutenant John H. Osler, of Guernsey county, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed.

MONTANA.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, introduced a joint resolution relative to certain acts of the Legislature of the Territory of Montana; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I ask that this resolution be put on its passage.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that an act entitled "An act to change the location of the capital of the Territory of Montana, also the license, revenue, and Sunday laws of said Territory," passed at the last session of the Legislature of Montana, be excepted from the provisions of an act, passed at the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, entitled "An act amendatory of an act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana," approved May 26, 1864.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I want to say that in the general bill providing—

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to debate.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will not occupy more than two or three minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Then I call the previous question.

On seconding the call for the previous question there were—ayes 16, noes 25; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, and Mr. BROOKS.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes forty-six, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Hiram Slocum.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. GARFIELD submitted the following resolution; on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the persons acting as clerks to the several committees of the House at the close of the Thirty-Ninth Congress shall receive pay at the same rate as heretofore during the present session.

On seconding the call for the previous question there were—ayes 40, noes 40; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. GARFIELD and LOAN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 49.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WARD. I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Debate arising, the resolution goes over under the rules.

JOHN PERRY.

Mr. SPALDING. In order to accommodate my friend from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] I introduce a bill for the relief of John Perry. The bill was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read at length, provides that the provisions of the act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions, approved June 6, 1866, shall apply to John Perry, of Illinois, a pensioner by virtue of a special act approved March 3, 1859.

The bill was ordered to engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEETING OF CONGRESS.

Mr. SCHENCK submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved (the Senate concurring.) That the Senate and House of Representatives do hereby each give consent to the other that each House of Congress shall adjourn the present session from the hour of twelve o'clock m. on Thursday next, the 28th day of March instant, to assemble again on the first Wednesday of May, the first Wednesday of June, the first Wednesday of September, and the first Wednesday of November of this year, unless the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall by joint proclamation, to be issued by them ten days before either of the times herein fixed for assembling, declare that there is no occasion for the meeting of Congress at such time.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 66, noes 27.

The main question was then ordered to be now put.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 30, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Buckland, Calkins, Rensler W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Donnelly, Briggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eila, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Hamilton, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Ladd, Kelley, Kitchin, Koontz, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, Moreau, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Platts, Polsey, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aorman, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—89.

NAYS—Messrs. Delos B. Ashley, Barnes, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Coburn, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Humphrey, Hunter, Kerr, Mallory, Marshall, Morrissey, Muir, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Shanks, Stewart, Taffe, Van Auker, and Van Trump—30.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, Baldwin, Boyer, Brownell, Broomall, Butler, Churchill, Cobb, Dawes, Denison, Dodge, Elliot, Fox, Halsey, Harding, Hill, Hulburd, Julian, Kelsey, Ketchum, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, McCullough, Moorhead, Morgan, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Ruess, Solye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Tabor, Taylor, Upson, William B. Washburn, Wood, and Woodbridge—45.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 25) providing for the importation into the United States of certain works of art duty free, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

WOOD AND KING.

Mr. TAFTE asked and obtained unanimous consent for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Wood & King.

HENRY A. SMYTHE.

The SPEAKER stated that he had been requested to lay the following letter before the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1867.

SIR: In the important matter now pending in that honorable body over which you preside, involving as it does my private and my official character, I respectfully request that by some proper order or resolution of the House I may be permitted to appear with counsel to produce and examine witnesses before the "Committee on Public Expenditures" charged with the continuation of the investigations in the New York custom-house, and of alleged misdemeanors in the administration of the office I now hold as "collector of customs at the port of New York."

And to that end I respectfully request that this memorial may be laid before the House.

Yours, with respect,

HENRY A. SMYTHE.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the request be granted.

Mr. BINGHAM. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I make the point of order that as a memorial this must be referred under the rules in the usual way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I put it in the shape of a resolution.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER stated that the business in order was the resolution submitted on Saturday in reference to the adjournment, on which the main question had been ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. In view of the action this morning I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY A. SMYTHE—AGAIN.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move that the prayer of Mr. Smythe be granted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to suspend the rules. It is only fair and right.

Mr. PRUYN. I ask to make a personal explanation in regard to this matter.

There was no objection.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege; and as I shall not probably again be in attendance at this session, I also ask leave to make a personal explanation. A few days since, when the discussion took place in this House in regard to the collector of New York and the New York custom-house, I made some remarks as to the collector and his appointment, and added a few words in the brief time allowed me as to the New York custom-house, its management, and influence. I not only avoided all personal charges, but, as the report in the Congressional Globe will show, spoke of the many excellent men, and men of high character, who had at different times held high positions in that office. I was then well aware, and had time allowed me would have alluded as I now gladly do to the fact, that a large number of persons of unimpeachable character and worth held subordinate appointments in the New York custom-house. They are not the persons who manage or direct its affairs. Nor did I in any way speak disparagingly of them. I have, however, received a letter from Hiram Barney, Esq., late collector of New York, a gentleman for whom I have a high regard, from which I infer that he has read a report of my remarks on the occasion alluded to in some newspaper which I have not seen, and in which I have been untruly represented as having made charges against the entire staff of the custom-house.

What I insisted upon was that the subordinates in the custom-house (as also in the Departments at Washington and in the civil service generally) should be appointed, not for political reasons, but after having been found qualified on a competitive examination; and that when reliable men are thus appointed they should not be interfered with in their politics any more than in their religion.

I have thought it proper, in view of the desire which Mr. Barney has expressed, to defend the New York custom-house against what he terms the "wholesale denunciations (of it) which seem to be received with so much satisfaction in Congress," to place a copy of his letter in the hands of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. HULBURD,] with the hope that the committee will allow Mr. Barney the opportunity he asks for.

Mr. HULBURD. May I say a word?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HULBURD. I wish merely to say, with reference to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] that I hope the House will vote down the proposition and let this matter go as it should to the Committee on Public Expenditures; and I venture to say if Mr. Smythe wishes an opportunity to be heard before that committee I have no doubt it will be accorded to him.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit my motion in the form of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the request of Henry A. Smythe, now collector of the port of New York, asking the privilege and permission to appear by counsel before the Committee on Public Expenditures in defense of his conduct as collector, now being examined into by said committee, be granted.

Mr. SPALDING. I think the gentleman had better leave it as the chairman of the committee has suggested. The committee will receive that evidence any how.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee did receive evidence and reported a part of it to this House. I want fair play.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot debate it without unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to ask the gentleman whether Mr. Smythe has ever applied to the committee for a hearing before them.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; he has gone to a higher authority and asked the Speaker to allow him to be heard.

Mr. GARFIELD. It would seem from the language of the petition to be almost implied that Mr. Smythe had failed to get a hearing before the committee, and that he now appeals to the House to order a hearing. I would like to know of the chairman of the committee whether any such application has been made and refused by the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. The answer to that is the committee was not instituted as a committee for trial, but to inquire and take evidence; and now this gentleman asks that he may appear for the purpose of presenting his testimony and making his defense.

Mr. GARFIELD. I asked for information.

Mr. RANDALL. I think you have succeeded in receiving that information.

Mr. HULBURD. Allow me to say that neither the committee of the last Congress nor of the present have ever refused to hear Mr. Smythe or any witnesses he wished to produce before them, and I do not think they have any wish to do so now.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the committee had refused to hear Mr. Smythe I would go for the order.

Mr. RANDALL. What Mr. Smythe desires is that if he is tried he may be represented either personally or by counsel.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to ask my colleague if it has ever been the custom of this House to allow parties who may be implicated by an investigation of a committee to appear before that committee with counsel for trial. My impression is, without being at all positive on the subject, that we appoint a committee to investigate a subject, acting somewhat like a grand jury, for the purpose of reporting the result of their investigation to the House, and that parties never appear before the committee with counsel and witnesses as if on trial. I would ask my colleague whether I am right as to the practice of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I cannot answer that question. The gentleman perfectly well understands that the committee do not allow anybody, if they can help it, to appear in defense of himself if they have a political object in view.

Mr. SCOFIELD. My colleague is discussing something else. I am inquiring about the universal practice of all committees in this House.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman will allow me, I will answer the inquiry. I do not suppose it is the universal practice to prohibit parties appearing by counsel before committees, but I beg leave to say in a matter of inquiry touching the conduct of a former member of this House he did appear before a committee of the House by his counsel, and did cross-examine several witnesses.

Mr. SCOFIELD. What committee was that?

Mr. BINGHAM. The Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the vote on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. COVODE. I wish to suggest to the House that it is the province of Mr. Smythe now to bring witnesses before the Committee on Public Expenditures. But as there appears to be an effort making toward his impeachment, I do not think it is his province to appear before them by counsel. I would, therefore, suggest that he be permitted to bring his witnesses before the committee, and let the committee examine them.

Mr. HULBURD. I wish to say that it has been the invariable practice of the committee since I have been a member of it to allow any person interested to come before them and produce witnesses, and that will continue to be their practice unless the House shall otherwise order. But we have never allowed counsel to appear, and in this instance I would not feel at liberty to do it without instructions from the House.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Expenditures [Mr. HULBURD] whether that committee are doing as they were ordered, proceeding forthwith to investigate with a view to impeachment. I had supposed that before this time they would have acted upon those instructions. If this man is innocent, then let the committee so report. I had supposed that before this time the committee would have reported articles of impeachment, or made an exculpatory report.

Mr. RANDALL. I would ask the gentleman what he, as chairman of the committee, has to fear in connection with the examination of this question, should Mr. Smythe be allowed to appear before that committee by counsel?

Mr. HULBURD. Nothing at all.

Mr. RANDALL. Then why not permit him to do so? Why stand up as a public investigator, and deny the privilege of a clean and thorough examination?

Mr. HULBURD. That privilege has never been yet accorded to any person.

Mr. RANDALL. Then the sooner we begin to do right the better.

Mr. HULBURD. If the House order it we will do so, and not otherwise.

Mr. RANDALL. I trust then the House will be driven to a sense of fairness, and grant the privilege Mr. Smythe asks.

Mr. BOYER. In addition to the case cited by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] where a party was allowed to appear before an investigating committee by counsel, I desire to say that I was a member of a committee of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, which was appointed to investigate a dispute between Mr. CONKLING and the Provost Marshal General, and they both, Mr. CONKLING and the Provost Marshal General, appeared before that committee with their counsel.

Mr. BANKS. I desire simply to say that this presents a question different from that presented by an ordinary investigation, in which any party who might be implicated would not have the right to appear before the committee by counsel. But here is an order of the House to investigate upon a distinct charge, upon evidence which has been published for a distinct purpose, and it appears to me that if a party publicly implicated desires to appear before the committee with counsel he should be granted that permission. The committee have control of the matter, and can limit the extent to which that privilege shall be exercised. I hope the request will be granted.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I hope this House will hesitate and ponder upon this question before it establishes a precedent of this sort. The direction which the House has given to the Committee on Public Expenditures is to inquire with reference to the impeachment of the party implicated. Now, are we to hold that there shall be two trials, one in this House, or before one of its committees, and another in the Senate, should articles of impeachment be found? The case referred to by my friend from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] bears no relation to this case. That was a case in which a member of Congress was concerned; and so was the one referred to by my colleague, [Mr. BOYER.] They were both of the same character, the jurisdiction being exclusively in this House. Now, if we change the whole practice in cases of this sort in the way asked then we shall have a trial in the first place here, and another trial in the second place in the Senate, should articles of impeachment be found.

Mr. RANDALL. If it is to result in impeachment, then the greater propriety of his having counsel.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman ever heard of a case before a grand jury where the defendant was allowed to produce witnesses? All they look for is a prima facie or presumptive case.

Mr. RANDALL. A grand jury hears but one side; that is what I want to avoid here.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I trust the House will hesitate before it establishes a precedent of this sort.

Mr. PRUYN. I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] himself appeared as counsel before one of the committees of this House a few years ago in the case of Judge Irwin.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I appeared on behalf of the prosecution in that case.

Mr. PRUYN. It does not matter on which side; it is a precedent.

Mr. COVODE. I have had considerable experience in investigations of this sort. I never allowed parties to appear by counsel except in one case; that was the case of Judge Black, then a member of Mr. Buchanan's Cabinet. He had counsel in a case in which he was indirectly interested. In no other case did I ever allow a counsel for the party charged to appear before the committee.

This committee, Mr. Speaker, is to some extent different from all others that we have before had in this House. It is to take action looking to the impeachment of Mr. Smythe, if there should appear sufficient ground for such a proceeding. It is the nature of a grand jury; and I deny that parties have a right to appear by counsel before a grand jury. The parties effected by an investigation in a committee may have a right to present their witnesses, but not to appear by counsel.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I ask leave to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection? There was no objection.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that according to all established precedent it is not proper that this resolution should be adopted. A committee of this House has been charged with the duty of making an investigation to see whether there is probable cause for recommending articles of impeachment against Mr. Smythe, collector of the port of New York. If this House should agree upon articles of impeachment they will go to the Senate, where the officer must have his trial. This committee is, I think, necessarily in the nature of a grand jury; and I do not believe that it is proper or precedent that counsel for the accused should appear until the trial is had before the Senate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] whether there is not a very clear and a very great difference between a grand jury and this committee? The grand jury that investigates criminal cases primarily is sworn to secrecy, and its proceedings are kept inviolate. This committee is reporting to the House, piecemeal, portions of the testimony, calculated to ruin utterly the character of this gentleman. Now, I am not his defender; but it seems to me that his request should be granted as a simple matter of justice. He is, as I understand it, an unprofessional man, a merchant, and desires to appear before the committee with some one competent to grasp and comprehend his case, some one capable of cross-examining the witnesses and presenting his case in its proper legal aspect before the committee. I wonder that the committee should object to this, unless its members desire—and I do not charge or believe that they do desire—to ruin utterly the character of this gentleman.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not the least desire to injure the character of Mr. Smythe, with whom I have not the pleasure of an acquaintance. I believe that the testimony before a committee of this kind is ordinarily kept secret; and that it would have been kept secret in this case if the reporter had not been bribed by this accused person, so that the testimony became public through his own act.

Now, sir, I say that the proceedings before this committee are analogous to those before a grand jury. The committee is not a court of any final jurisdiction. It is not a court that can try this person. Its duty is simply to examine the case and report to the House whether there is cause for further action. All that the committee can do is that which a grand jury does under the power conferred by general law. I think that if we should adopt this resolution the precedent would be a bad one. If this man is allowed to appear by counsel before this committee, then on all subsequent proceedings before committees, involving questions of this character, counsel may be allowed to appear.

Mr. COVODE. In the impeachment of the President, for instance.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Yes, sir; as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] suggests, the President might ask to send counsel before the Judiciary Committee, who have under investigation the question of his impeachment. I am sure no gentleman on this floor will say it would be proper to grant that privilege to the President of the United States. The granting of the privilege proposed in this resolution is not in accordance with the general course of analogous proceedings. It would work mischief; while I cannot see that any injury would arise to this gentleman if he should be allowed only such privileges as are ordinarily extended on like circumstances.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection? There was no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg leave to say that in this matter of impeachment there is no inquest known to the Constitution of the United States except the House of Representatives. No committee of the House of Representatives was ever an inquest either for impeachment or anything else. A committee in a case of this kind, in which a civil officer is charged with impeachable offenses, is simply a commission to take testimony to be reported to and considered by the House.

This being the case, it rests necessarily in the discretion of the House whether the officer charged shall be allowed to appear in person or by attorney before the committee and examine witnesses. If there be such circumstances in the case as make it improper in the judgment of the House to allow the investigation of this committee to be made public by the admission to its chamber of the party accused in his own person or to appear by counsel, it is competent for the House to say so, and to act accordingly. But, sir, where the party is a subordinate officer of the Government, incapable in the nature of things of influencing the House or any of the members of its committees—if it be possible either could be influenced under any circumstances—I stand here to say it is simply an act of injustice and would be a reproach on the House to deny the humble petition of the party charged before our bar, and deny him the privilege of appearing by his counsel before your committee and examine witnesses. I was willing to refer the petition to the Committee on Public Expenditures, believing the committee would grant it or refer the question back to the House.

Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to say that the practice of the Congress of the United States on this subject is by no means uniform. It may be within the recollection of the honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] who sits to my right, if he were a member of Congress at the time, as I believe he was, when the investigation was made concerning the privileges of this House alleged to have been infringed by General Houston, of Texas, that the defendant was permitted to be present by counsel and to cross-examine in open House. Is not that so?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. And I beg leave to make a further remark. In the matter of the investigation of charges against a member of this House in the Thirty-Seventh Congress the party appeared, not only in person, as I recollect, but also by one of the most learned members of the Baltimore bar throughout the investigation. I beg leave to make the further remark. If gentleman will turn back to the published official reports of the Thirty-Fifth Congress they will discover in the matter of the investigation for the impeachment of Judge Watrous, a district judge of the United States for the district of Texas, that he appeared in the sessions of the committee throughout its examination, and cross-examined under the direction of his counsel, who was for some time the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I wish to know whether, in the case of Watrous, to which the gentleman refers, any witnesses were produced on the part of the defense. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRYOR] referred to the case of Judge Irwin, where I was counsel, the facts had escaped my recollection. He was allowed to appear before the committee by counsel, but produced no witnesses, and no effort on his part was made to do so.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will answer the gentleman. I am not by any means satisfied from my recollection now, although I was in the Congress of the United States, but in the Thirty-Fifth Congress I was not a member of the Committee on the Judiciary. I remember the report of the committee and considered it carefully. I made some remarks on the subject in the House, and as it rests in my memory to-day, although I am by no means certain on the point, he did call independent testimony, and did examine witnesses in the committee. This matter can easily be ascertained. But that does not alter the question, because by making this instruction you leave the committee in full possession of their own judgment, and if they have any doubt about the propriety, as the organ of this House, of allowing adverse witnesses to be called on the motion of the accused, they themselves, according to the custom, will refer the question to the House, together with such suggestions as in their discretion they may see fit.

In making these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to say I do not wish to be understood as intimating for a single moment I doubt the capacity of the committee to do full justice to the matter, or its willingness to do full justice, for I indicated my confidence in the committee by making a reference of the memorial to it. But I did it under the impression that the committee would either of their own motion grant the petition or refer the question back to the House, with such reasons for or against the application of the petitioner as they might deem best. But, sir, as this question has been made here, not by the House, but upon that memorial, and in view of all that has transpired in the case, considering that the accused is a subordinate officer of the Government, I believe that it is due to ourselves and to justice and fair dealing to allow him to appear before the committee, to be heard either personally or by counsel, and I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. COVODE. I ask leave to make a statement.

Mr. PILE. I object.

The question was put on the motion to suspend the rules, and there were—ayes 56, noes 25; no quorum voting.

The CHAIR ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. WARD and RANDALL.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 38; two thirds not voting in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HULBURD. I have no objection to the rules being suspended and the resolution being passed. I wanted simply the sense of the House on the subject. I have no personal objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the motion?

Mr. WARD. I desire the question to be taken.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there any way in which I can accept the proposition of the chairman of the committee?

The SPEAKER. There is not; the House has been counted by tellers, and they have reported that two thirds have not voted in the affirmative.

Mr. RANDALL. Can I not withdraw the motion and make it over again?

The CHAIRMAN. There are many members who want the floor, and the Chair would very likely recognize another gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I will have to adhere to my motion.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 80, nays 35, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Butler, Chandler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cornell, Denison, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eldridge, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Getz, Glossbrenner, Gravelly, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hill, Holman, Chester D. So (two thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WOODBRIDGE, the papers in the case of the heirs of John E. Boulogny were withdrawn from the files of the House.

On motion of Mr. KERR, the papers in the case of Leonard Smith were withdrawn from the files.

On motion of Mr. BANKS, the papers of William Dorset, in the case of the French spoiliations, were withdrawn from the files.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BEAMAN asked and obtained leave of absence for the residue of the session.

GOVERNMENT OF THE REBEL STATES.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, submitted the following privileged resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to present to the Secretary of State the act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate restoration," together with the certificates of the Clerk of the House of Representatives and Secretary of the Senate, showing that the said act was passed by the vote of two thirds of both Houses of Congress, after the objections of the President thereto had been received, and after the reconsideration of said act by both Houses in accordance with the Constitution.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DREDGING MOUTH OF MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. PILE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at this time a joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of War to build dredge-boats for use at the mouth of the Mississippi river.

Mr. COVODE. I object.

Mr. PILE. I will ask to have the joint resolution read for information, and then I will ask leave to make a short explanation.

The joint resolution was read at length. It authorizes the Secretary of War, on the recommendation of the engineer department, to build and operate two dredge-boats for the purpose of deepening and keeping open the channel of one or more of the passes at the mouth of the Mississippi, and to expend for that purpose so much as may be necessary of the present appropriations for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi river.

Mr. PILE. It will be seen that no appropriation is made by this joint resolution. It has been found by experience that the mouths of the Mississippi river cannot be opened and kept open by contract, as the law now requires the work to be done; for so soon as the work is done, and the contractor paid off, the mouths of the river are again filled up within a few weeks by the light sand brought down by the waters of the Mississippi. The engineer department says the only practical way of keeping the channels open is by the constant use of dredge-boats there. I hope the joint resolution will pass.

Mr. CHANLER. I must object, unless the resolution is so amended as to include the mouths of all the rivers on our coast.

Mr. PILE. I move that the rules be suspended to allow the introduction and consideration of the joint resolution at this time.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to; two thirds voting in the affirmative.

The joint resolution was introduced, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PILE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNEXPENDED MONEYS IN NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at this time a joint resolution to cover into the Treasury of the United States unexpended moneys now in the control of the Navy Department.

Mr. BROOKS. Let it be read.

The joint resolution was read at length. It provides that the amounts of money not estimated for, and asked by the Navy Department, to be appropriated by Congress to the use of said Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, now under the control of the said Department, be, and the same are hereby, ordered to be covered into the Treasury of the United States, and thereby taken from the control of the said Navy Department.

Mr. BROOKS. I would like to know what this resolution really means.

Mr. LOGAN. The object of the resolution is to place in the Treasury of the United States moneys now in the control of the Navy Department, not asked for by the Department and not required by it.

Mr. BROOKS. Is not there now a general law to meet the case?

Mr. LOGAN. There is not. By referring to the report of the Secretary of the Navy, published at the last session of Congress, it will be seen that he reports as the total available resources of the Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, the sum of $117,944,060 48. After estimating for certain purposes, the Secretary goes on to say:

"The large unexpended balance in the Treasury at the close of the last fiscal year is embraced in appropriations under more than one hundred different heads. Many of these are continuous, have been made for years, their expenditure will be protracted through years to come, and, though assisting to make up a large balance, cannot be dispensed with. There are large amounts, however, under the heads of 'construction,' 'steam engineering,' 'ordnance,' 'provisions and clothing,' and 'fuel,' which can with propriety revert to the Treasury. No appropriations under these heads were made for the current year, and for the ensuing year none are asked. In the course of time the appropriations would be exhausted, but it is not believed to be in accordance with sound public policy in time of peace to continue such large amounts at the disposal of the Department."

"Liberal appropriations for the naval service were made during the existence of the war, but the funds of the Department were always carefully and economically expended. This fact is attested by the numerous claims of contractors for relief now before Congress; and the result is that the Department is able to complete all the vessels and engines contracted for before the close of the war, and designate appropriations to the amount of about fifty million dollars that can be relinquished to the Treasury, or may be otherwise disposed of by Congress."

It has heretofore been deemed essential to correct administration that there should be annual estimates for proposed expenditures and specific appropriations therefor after examination by Congress, and this Department has no desire to evade this annual scrutiny.

The Secretary of the Navy himself declares in his report that it would be proper to cover this money into the Treasury, so as to take it from under his control. It strikes me that the proper way of doing the business of the country would be to have this money placed in the Treasury, and then require the Department to make estimates for and ask Congress to appropriate such amounts as may be required to carry on the operations of the Department. No estimates are made and no money asked for by the Navy Department for the reason that the Secretary now has millions in his hands unexpended. It strikes me it is rather a novel way of doing business, at least not a very business-like way, to allow the sum of $117,000,000 to be in the hands of the Navy Department, without any estimate for it or order by Congress in relation to the use to be made of it. I know that in ordinary transactions men of business would not act in that way, and it seems to me we should not allow any Department of this Government to carry on business in that way when we have the whole matter within our own control.

Mr. BROOKS. The statements and the theories of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] are doubtless all very correct. But I am not satisfied that there does not now exist a general law—if not there ought to be one—throwing all these unexpended sums back into the Treasury. My own recollection is that there is such a general law now; and I would suggest, if there be doubts on the subject, that the law be made general, not particular.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, sir, I should be glad if there were a law of that kind; but if there is,

I have been unable to find it. The Secretary of the Navy does not understand that there is such a law. If there is a law of the kind it would obviate any necessity for the action which I now propose. I find the Secretary of the Navy saying in his report:

"It has heretofore been deemed essential to correct administration that there should be annual estimates for proposed expenditures and specific appropriations therefor after examination by Congress, and this Department has no desire to evade this annual scrutiny."

This would certainly leave the impression on the mind of any one reading it that there is no law requiring him to pay this money into the Treasury. He certainly does not understand that there is such a law.

Mr. BROOKS. I believe the law is that balances remaining unexpended for two years go back into the Treasury.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I think there is a very old law requiring that all balances not expended within a certain time shall go back to the Treasury. I do not think that law has ever been repealed.

Mr. LOGAN. If there is such a law applying in this case, the Secretary of the Navy must be very ignorant in reference to the law; for he says:

"As several of the bureaus will have unexpended appropriations, which will be ample for some time to come, they have made no estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think that the law to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers relates only to appropriations. Balances of appropriations remaining unexpended for two years are covered again into the Treasury. The $98,000,000 to which the gentleman from Illinois refers has been received, as I understand, from the sale of property. It is not money appropriated by Congress; and hence I presume it would not come within the law to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state in reference to that matter that the greater part of this amount of $117,000,000 now in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy has never been appropriated by Congress, but has accrued in his hands by reason of the sale of property belonging to the Navy Department, which was ordered to be disposed of by resolution of Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to state that this sum of $98,000,000 is now in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy, or that it is in the Treasury and is counted as a part of the balance in the Treasury?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not state that it is in the Treasury. I have no evidence of any such fact. The evidence I have from this report is that the money is in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy unappropriated and unexpended.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand the fact, money arising from the sale of property in this way is uniformly paid into the Treasury of the United States, and is counted as a balance in the Treasury; and no Department of the Government, as I understand, can draw any money from the Treasury without a specific appropriation by Congress. If there is this $98,000,000 or $117,000,000 to the credit of the Navy Department, then not one dollar of that fund can be drawn except by requisition of the Secretary of the Navy and on specific appropriation by Congress.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Does not the Secretary of the Navy in his report state that the money which is referred to, or most of it, is derived from appropriations heretofore made under a hundred different heads, and not from the sale of property?

Mr. LOGAN. I will quote the language of the Secretary, which is as follows:

"The large unexpended balance in the Treasury at the close of the last fiscal year is embraced in appropriations under more than one hundred different heads. Many of these are continuous, have been made for years, their expenditure will be protracted through years to come, and, though assisting to make up a large balance, cannot be dispensed with. There are large amounts, however, under the heads of 'construction,' 'steam engineering,' 'ordnance,' 'provisions and clothing,' and 'fuel,' which can with propriety revert to the Treasury. No appropriations under these heads were made for the current year, and for the ensuing year none are asked. In the course of time the appropriations would be exhausted, but it is not believed to be in accordance with sound public policy in time of peace to continue such large amounts at the disposal of the Department."

That is the language of the Secretary of the Navy. He says they can with propriety revert to the Treasury, but they never have reverted to the Treasury. They are not in the Treasury, but under the control of the Secretary of the Navy, and for that reason no appropriation under these heads has been asked for.

But my idea is this: they have no right to expend money except that appropriated by Congress, and when money accumulates in their hands it should be placed in the Treasury of the United States. When any of these Departments require money they should submit the proper estimates and await the regular appropriation by Congress.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to accept an amendment, that not only the Navy Department, but all the other Departments having unexpended balances accruing before June, 1866, shall be required to cover them back into the Treasury of the United States. The ordnance department has a balance of $18,000,000. They had $16,000,000 more than that during the last year, which were expended without any estimates being submitted to the Congress of the United States, and this $18,000,000 will be expended in precisely the same way on heavy guns, which have never been tested as to their capacity and endurance.

Mr. LOGAN. In reply to the gentleman from New York, I will say that my resolution already embraces the ordnance department of the Navy. It is specially referred to as having a portion of this unexpended balance in its hands, and my resolution comprises at least that part of the Navy Department.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I do not know that I understand the report of the Secretary of the Navy. He sent for the current year an estimate for $13,252,906 besides that for the Marine corps; and it was reported in the bill making appropriations for that arm of the service, and passed both branches of Congress. I do not see why, under the law, these unexpended balances have not gone into the surplus fund long ago.

Mr. LOGAN. Perhaps I have not been able to make myself understood in reference to this matter. I understand that the Secretary of the Navy declares first, that he has over ninety-eight million dollars of unexpended balances on hand; and then he further declares that he has so much more money which has accumulated in his hands from the sales of certain articles. He asks for an appropriation of $18,000,000. He has over one hundred and seventeen million dollars in his hands. He will then have, after the appropriation of $18,000,000, almost $100,000,000 over and above the estimate submitted to Congress, and for which appropriation was asked for the Navy Department.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the gentleman to claim that the Secretary of the Navy can use this money without the action of Congress?

Mr. LOGAN. He himself positively says that he can under the law. He says this money is in his hands unexpended, having thus accumulated under his control, and that it has not been taken from his control by any action of Congress. Not only so; he declares further in his report that the heads of different bureaus having these large amounts on hand, accumulated from the sale of property, they have for that reason made no application to Congress for appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868. That is the reason he gives why they have asked for no appropriation. He says they have made no requisitions because they have large amounts on hand which he believes will last for several years. At least he understands that they can expend this money without any appropriation by Congress. My object is that they shall be permitted to do no such thing; that they shall be permitted to expend no money except that which has been granted to them by direct appropriation by Congress.

By this resolution we cover the money into the Treasury Department, and if they require money for ordnance or for any of the bureaus of the Navy Department they must make their estimates and signify to Congress what they want it for, and then Congress can give it to them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was read a first, second, and third time.

Mr. BOYER. Is it in order to move to lay the resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BOYER. Inasmuch as there may be some confusion introduced into the accounts if this resolution is passed, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations when appointed, in order that it may be brought up at some future time, when we may have a better opportunity to investigate the subject, as it seems to me it ought to be investigated.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I have presented the resolution in order to take the sense of the House upon it. If the House is willing that the Navy Department shall have $117,000,000 it has a right to say so. But I say to gentlemen that the Secretary of the Navy in his report himself asks Congress to do just what I have asked it to do.

Mr. BOYER. I do not see that that is any reason why this should not be referred to the appropriate committee, and therefore I insist on the motion.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I suggest that it would be better to refer it to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BOYER. I accept the suggestion.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no such committee.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. When appointed there will be.

Mr. LOGAN. There may be no money left when that committee is appointed.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask consent to offer a substitute.

Mr. LOGAN. I will hear it read for information.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That all the appropriations to meet the disbursements of the War or Navy Departments, or any of the bureaus thereof, for or in aid of the suppression of the rebellion, made prior to June 30, 1866, unexpended, but liable to draft by any of the disbursing officers of either of those Departments at this date, shall be covered in the Treasury.

Mr. LOGAN. I cannot accept that. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first question was on the motion of Mr. Boyer, to refer the resolution to the Committee on Naval Affairs when appointed; and being taken, it was disagreed to—ayes 24, noes 72.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LOGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AFFAIRS IN MARYLAND.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent to present two memorials for the purpose of having them printed. First, from members of the General Assembly of Maryland, asking the immediate consideration by Congress of the condition of public affairs in that State; and second, resolutions adopted by the Grand Union League of Maryland.

No objection being made, the memorials were ordered to be printed.

CONTINGENT APPROPRIATION OF THE SENATE.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to take up from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 83, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

No objection being made, the bill was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend by striking out all after the enacting clause of the second section, as follows:

That section ten of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," passed at the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, shall not be construed to allow a greater compensation for the publication of the laws passed by Congress and executive proclamations and treaties in the papers of the District of Columbia than is provided by law for such publications in other papers.
